It provides for the allowance to F. M. Gunnell, of $156, for certain extraordinary expenses incurred by him in the discharge of his duty at San Francisco, California.

The petitioner, an assistant surgeon in the Navy, attached to the United States ship Independence, of the Pacific squadron, was ordered by Captain Josiah Tatnall, on the 17th day of September, 1855, to proceed to San Francisco, and report himself for duty at the United States naval rendezvous in that city, and to return to the ship when the rendezvous should be closed. Under this order the petitioner performed the duty assigned him twelve weeks in the city of San Francisco. His board, during that time, on shore, amounted, according to the voucher filed by him, twelve weeks, at eighteen dollars, to $216. In view of the fact that in fixing the salary of his grade, reference was had to its ordinary expenses, the committee deem it but equitable, and in conformity with the usage of Congress, to reimburse the memorialist for any extraordinary expense incident to public duty assigned him properly incurred. Had the memorialist remained on board of the ship, in the discharge of his duties as an assistant surgeon, his mess bill would not probably have exceeded twenty dollars per month; deducting this amount from his expenses on shore, leaves the sum of $156.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

TOWNSEND HARRIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Townsend Harris, which proposes to allow him $10,000 for his services and expenses in negotiating a treaty of commerce between the kingdom of Siam and the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. SLIDELL. I was about to say, that while I think Mr. Harris is entitled to some compensation for his services, this allowance is, in my opinion, extravagant. It is not one to which I assented in the committee. At first a smaller sum was agreed to by the Committee on Foreign Relations, but there was a reconsideration, and the bill was agreed to be reported as it was reconsidered. I prefer that it should go over, for the amount is too large.

Mr. MASON. I understood there was to be no debate on any bill to-day, or I should avail myself of the occasion to reply to what fell from the honorable Senator from Louisiana. ["No objection."] I mean only to state, that the reasons actuating the committee were satisfactory to my mind.

The bill was passed over.

ANTHONY CASLO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 255) for the relief of Anthony Caslo, a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. CLAY. I object to that bill.

ALEXANDER RANDALL.

The bill (S. No. 256) further explanatory of an act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act for the relief of Adam D. Steuart and of Alexander Randall, executor of Daniel Randall, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes so to construe the act of August 18, 1856, as to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alexander Randall, executor of Daniel Randall, a commission, at the rate stated in the act, upon the sum of $218,429 63, in addition to the commission heretofore allowed him under the act, being the residue of the amount received and collected by Daniel Randall in Mexico, as deputy Paymaster General of the United States Army during the war with that Republic.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE SIEUR DE BONNE AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 259) authorizing the courts to adjudicate the claim of the legal representatives of the Sieur De Bonne, and of the Chevalier De Repentigny, to certain land at the Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I think that bill, perhaps, had better go over to-day. It ought to be looked into. I do not know but that it may be right.

The bill was passed over.

CAPTORS OF BRIG CALEDONIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that bill go over.

WILLIAM CRUICKSHANK AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of William Cruickshank, J. S. Polack, Calhoun Benham, and Frederick A. Sawyer, of San Francisco.

Mr. GREEN. I object to that bill, and I think I can give a satisfactory reason why it ought not to pass.

MICHAEL NASH.

The bill (S. No. 261) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It makes an appropriation of $776 50 to Michael Nash, as additional compensation for services rendered as assistant superintendent of the penitentiary of the District of Columbia from August 17, 1841, to March 7, 1849, inclusive.

Mr. KING. I ask for the reading of the report on that case.

The Clerk read the report made by Mr. KENNEDY from the Committee on the District of Columbia, by which it appeared that Nash was appointed in June, 1840, as guard at the penitentiary at a compensation of $550 per annum, but soon after his appointment, at the suggestion of the inspectors he was assigned to duty as superintendent of the convict shoemakers, being himself a practical shoemaker, in which position the inspectors think his services were worth $100 a year more than he received, and his successor has had an addition of that amount to his salary. The object of the bill is to add $100 per annum to his pay during his term of service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD D. ROWLAND.

The bill (S. No. 262) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Richard D. Rowland, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to the heirs, executors, administrators, or legal representatives of Richard D. Rowland, deceased, late of Alabama, of $3,200; and to the heirs, executors, administrators, or legal representatives of whomsoever possesses whatever title the United States gave to the southeast quarter of section two, township fourteen, range eight east, of the lands selected in Alabama, and sold under the treaty of March 24, 1832, with the Creek Indians, for the benefit of the orphans of the tribe, of $2,260, with interest at the rate of five and a half per cent. per annum, upon both sums, from November 1, 1836.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the report in that case be read.

The Clerk read the report made by Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by which it appeared that the United States sold the land to the parties, but it was afterwards recovered from them by one of the Indians.

Mr. FITCH. In the haste of drafting the bill there was a small error. In line ten, after the word "gave," I move to insert the names of the original purchasers, "Puritan Smith and Heffner."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FITCH. I move to amend the title by adding the words "and others" to it.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS WLODECKI.

The bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize him to locate one hundred and twenty acres of land on any public lands subject to private entry, at $1 25 an acre, in full discharge of his claim under the act of June 30, 1854, "granting land to certain exiles from Poland."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER COPELAND.

The bill (S. No. 264) confirming to Alexander Copeland four hundred and eighty acres of land in Sonoma county, California, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POLK. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state in a word what the case is. There was a certain rancho in California, of which a small portion was sold to this individual. When application was made to the United States commissioners for the confirmation of the titles, the holder of the main body of the rancho presented his title, and it was confirmed. This memorialist having a small portion of the rancho, supposed that it would all be confirmed in one body, and was so advised; but when the confirmation came, his little farm was excluded. It was then too late for him, under the law, to present his claim. He merely lost his confirmation by bad advice. He lives on the land and cultivates it, and the title under which he holds has already been confirmed to the remainder of the land.

Mr. POLK. I do not ask for the reading of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

T. HART HYATT.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on a small private claim. It is my fault that the report was not made yesterday and the bill now on the Calendar. I desire the bill to be considered at once.

The bill (S. No. 270) for the relief of T. Hart Hyatt was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading. It proposes to allow Mr. Hyatt, consul at Amoy, China, $1,500 for judicial services, under the act of August 11, 1848, from July 1, 1855, to January 1, 1857.

Mr. GREEN. I object to the bill. I want it to take the same course with the others of the same kind.

Mr. SLIDELL. There is really no objection to this. It is making an appropriation for an indebtedness that actually exists, for which there is no previous appropriation. The claim is recognized. Will the Senator hear the report?

Mr. GREEN. I will hear the report.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. GREEN. I withdraw my objection to the bill.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Louisiana, whether this is an exception to the ordinary rule? Have other consuls had this pay?

Mr. SLIDELL. There are certain consuls who by law were entitled to an annual salary for the judicial services. I think there is no analogy between this case and the bill which was objected to to-day, for the payment of the consul at Alexandria. He was not allowed any salary by law for these services. The difficulty in this case, however, is not that there is any doubt that this man is entitled to the compensation, but no appropriation has been made for it. It might, perhaps, more properly have come in under the deficiency bill. It results from the construction given to the law by the Attorney General, and by the Department of State. They say that the law of 1855, fixing the salaries of consuls, did not at all touch that provision which had previously given them an annual allowance for their judicial services.

Mr. KING. That is a question upon the construction of the law. The inquiry I made was, what has been the practice of the Government in reference to other consuls? Have they been paid their salaries for judicial services in all cases but this?

Mr. SLIDELL. They have been uniformly paid.

Mr. KING. Then I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. Perhaps I may be mistaken when I say they have been uniformly paid. There may be another case of a similar character. If it has not been paid it is not because the Department did not consider the amount due, but because no funds had been appropriated for the payment, owing to a misconstruction of the law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

The bill (S. No. 193) authorizing the issuing of certain land warrants to the legal representatives of deceased persons entitled thereto, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SLIDELL. That is not a private bill.

Mr. EVANS. I think the Senator is mistaken. It only provides for a small number of persons in a particular case, and is not as much a bill of a public character as some which have been passed to-day.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will not insist on the objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 193) authorizing the issuing of certain bounty land warrants to the legal representatives of deceased persons entitled thereto, was passed. My object is to move an additional section, which I supposed was included in the original bill, but it is not; and I think it is of more importance than the bill itself. I will read the section, if desired, that I want to insert, and make a brief explanation.

The motion to reconsider the vote passing the bill was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. If it be necessary, I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) By unanimous consent an amendment can be made.

Mr. BROWN. The section I propose to add is this:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases where persons holding bounty land warrants, under this or any previous act of Congress, have died, or shall hereafter die, without heirs entitled to inherit under any existing law, the warrant may be sold and assigned by the executor or administrator as real estate, and located under such regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe.

I will make a word of explanation. There are some cases of this sort—where persons have died leaving no heirs, and leaving no estate except simply the land warrant. I know there was one case, at least, in my own State. The friends of the party buried him properly, believing that the warrant would be made available. They took an order for its sale, and sold it; but the Department here refused to recognize the sale, and the warrant is worthless. There are a number of these cases—perhaps not amounting to a great deal in all, but of importance to the parties interested in them. The Government has issued the warrant, but it is of no value to any one; and where a person dies indebted, certainly the bounty which the Government has given ought to go to pay his honest creditors—at least his funeral debt.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the original bill read.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, That where any person who has made or shall make application for, and be entitled to receive, a certificate or warrant from the Department of the Interior for lands under the provisions of the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved 3d of March, 1855, shall die before the issuing and receipt of such certificate or warrant, the legal representatives of such deceased person, so entitled to such certificate or warrant, shall be authorized and entitled to receive the same from said Interior Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest a verbal alteration to the original bill. It is probably designed to cover all cases where parties have died, as well as where they shall die hereafter. I think that alteration should be made by inserting the words "shall have died."

Mr. STUART. The Senator is right. The only question in my mind is, whether it is not better simply to use the word "die."

The alteration was made by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWN. Now I offer my proposed amendment.

Mr. POLK. It appears that the section provides for cases where the warrant has actually issued.

Mr. BROWN. Of course.

Mr. POLK. I suppose every State of the Union has laws by which, on the death of the party, there can be a disposition of that kind of property.

Mr. BROWN. My friend is altogether mistaken. No State regulation can authorize you to locate one of these warrants. They must be located under the authority of Congress. In my State, the exact law to which the Senator alludes does exist. We have a law to sell them, but they are utterly worthless after they are sold, because this Government will not allow them to be located.

Mr. GREEN. I will suggest to the Senator from Mississippi a slight amendment. He says they shall be sold "as real estate."

Mr. BROWN. Well, I will strike out the words "as real estate."

Mr. GREEN. It makes a complicated manner of selling in several States, and the conveyance has to be by deed.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that that is a proper matter of legislation for the States. It is so provided now in some States, and can be in all.

Mr. BROWN. If my friend from Ohio will suggest to me any mode by which a State can compel the location of a land warrant, I will give way to hear him.

Mr. PUGH. She cannot compel it.

Mr. BROWN. I say again we have a law in our State authorizing the sale of these warrants, but the purchaser gets nothing. He gets simply a piece of paper, which is utterly worthless to him, because the Government does not authorize it to be located, except in a particular way.

Mr. PUGH. I do not care much about it; but I rather think it is an unnecessary provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires unanimous consent to receive the amendment at this stage.

There being no objection, the amendment was received.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator who reported the bill, that its language may need a little further alteration; but I do not want to be too particular. It says, "that where any person who has made, or shall make, appli cation for, and shall be entitled to receive." That last "shall" refers to the future.

Mr. STUART. That merely refers to the completeness of the proof. He has made application, and his application must be such as shall entitle him to a warrant. The Senator will see that it relates to the character of proof.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the common sense of it, but I did not know that they would make a sensible construction.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senate will now return to the commencement of the Calendar, and take up a case in which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has an interest, and which, I think, is the first one. But at all events, let us return to the first case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of bills upon the Calendar in their order.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senate will now allow the bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery to be passed.

Mr. STUART. It will be reached regularly in a few minutes.

THOMAS J. PAGE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish a motion entered to reconsider a bill, which was passed yesterday, in favor of Thomas J. Page, commander in the United States Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were two bills passed for his relief.

Mr. HOUSTON. I allude to the bill appropriating over $300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. We have agreed (I think the Senator from New Hampshire moved it, or, at any rate, he was an advocate for the proposition) to adjourn finally on the 7th of June. How can we do it if we do not sit every day in the week? I hope the Senate will sit to-morrow, and let us act on the deficiency bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am in favor of the Senate sitting to-morrow; there is business for it to do; but I should be opposed to its acting on the deficiency bill to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. I should be very glad to have to-morrow for the District of Columbia business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to taking up any kind of business except the deficiency bill.

Mr. BROWN. I will furnish business if the Senate will meet.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall feel it my duty to endeavor to get up the deficiency bill, and the Senate can do as it pleases.

Mr. BROWN. There is no lack of business, and I hope we shall not adjourn over.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope, if the Senate have a session to-morrow, the Pacific railroad bill will not be postponed for the deficiency bill. I do not see my colleague in his seat now, but I hope, if we have a session to-morrow, we shall consider the railroad bill.

*Mr. HUNTER. That proposition can be decided to-morrow, not now. I do not propose to make any order now. I am merely opposing the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. FESSENDEN and Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Durkee, Evans, Green, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Kennedy, King, Sebastian, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sumners, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, and Wright—25.

So the Senate refused to adjourn to Monday.

INDIANA MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Mr. STUART. The first bill now in order is the one to which I referred; and, inasmuch as it has been two or three times up before the Senate, I hope it will be disposed of now. It is the bill S. No. 46.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends.

Mr. MASON. I have understood the policy of the Government to be to grant preemptions in favor of actual settlers who cultivate the land, and to that extent improve the country; but this is a proposition to extend it to a religious society. I am sure it will involve debate, and I move therefore that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. H. CHAPMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE ON KANSAS.

The SPEAKER appointed the following gentlemen as managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union: Messrs. ENGLISH, STEPHENS of Georgia, and HOWARD.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence; when the Speaker signed the same.

The SPEAKER stated that reports were in order from the Committee of Claims, in reference to business from the Court of Claims.

LANDS TO AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES, ETC.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. It will be recollected by the House that a bill was reported yesterday, from the Committee on Public Lands, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, accompanied by a majority and a minority report. A motion is pending to print these reports, and to postpone the consideration of the subject. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that, pending the motion to postpone, the reports may be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

CORRECTION.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a privileged question. I see that, in reference to the river and harbor bill, and the consulate at Rosario bill, reported by me yesterday, it does not appear that the reports accompanying those bills were ordered to be printed. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that those reports be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the order to print appears upon the Journal.

DES MOINES RIVER.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa in relation to a grant of land by Congress for the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines river, in order that they may be referred to the committee which now has that subject under consideration.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIDSON. It must be manifest to every member of the House, that if we are to adjourn in June, this day and to-morrow should be devoted, as contemplated by the rules, to private business. I move, therefore, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would suggest that it would be better to devote a short time to the reception of reports from committees on private business.

Mr. DAVIDSON. If you call the committees for reports, you will never get into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Louisiana waive his motion until some Senate bills on the Speaker's table can be read and referred?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Certainly, sir.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, from the Senate, were then taken from the Speaker's table, severally read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

An act (No. 225) for the relief of Andrew Gaskell. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act (No. 242) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Luther Jewett, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, in the State of Maine. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act (No. 208) for the relief of Fabius Stanley. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An act (No. 162) for the relief of John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The question recurred upon Mr. DAVIDSON's motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suggest that an unanimous consent be given to consider this as "objection day." We can then run through the Calendar; but it is obvious that if we begin to debate the bills we shall make no progress at all.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments, and is now upon the Speaker's table. I ask that it be taken up, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SEWARD. I give notice that I object to anything being done by unanimous consent, unless we can be allowed to report bills from committees.

The SPEAKER. This is one of the regular appropriation bills returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not care if the Government falls. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think we might spend an hour profitably in receiving reports from committees, and I hope we shall do so.

The SPEAKER. That will be the regular order of business, if the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana shall be voted down.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I hope it will be voted down.

The question was taken on Mr. DAVIDSON's motion; and it was agreed to—ayes one hundred and two, noes not counted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. NICHOLS in the chair.)

COURT OF CLAIMS—ADVERSE REPORTS.

The Chairman stated the first business in order to be an adverse report (C. C. No. 116) upon the petition of Augustine Demers and others, administrators of Francis Chaudonet.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose that the case now up, being an adverse report from the Court of Claims, should be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the committee be concurred in, unless some gentleman wishes to have the report read.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to have the report read.

The report was read.

Mr. SEWARD. I think we ought not to be in too great a hurry to commit ourselves to the decision of the Court of Claims, growing out of the statute of limitations.

The report was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

The next case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 123) upon the petition of Joshua R. Jewett, heir of Joseph Jewett.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. HOUSTON. These adverse reports from the Court of Claims should be, it seems to me, passed over without the reports being read, unless their reading be specially called for by some member of the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I have called for the reading.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not hear the gentleman call for it.

The reading of the report was proceeded with. Mr. SEWARD. Perhaps I am doing wrong by asking for the reading of these reports; but I have been wanting to report a bill for two months, and have been cut off by the House going into a Committee of the Whole House. However, as it may be wrong to carry out the act of aggression, I withdraw my call for the reading of the reports.

The report was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

The next case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 127) upon the petition of Robert Harrison.

Mr. HAWKINS. I ask that this report be referred to the Committee of Claims. The case is one of a series of cases in which my constituents feel a very deep interest. It is a test case, on which all these others depend. The report in this case comprises something like two hundred and thirty-eight pages; and the opinion of the court itself numbers, I think, something like sixty pages. The decision of the court was not unanimous; one judge was perhaps in favor of the claim; another was in favor of the principle of the claim, while he admitted that his hands were tied by the act of Congress. I would also say to the committee that this subject is now undergoing investigation before a committee of the Senate, and I am anxious to await the action of that committee before this House acts upon it. Therefore, owing to the great interests involved in this bill, owing to the fact that the report cannot be read and discussion had upon it, without great loss of time, I move that the matter be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The next case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 130) upon the petition of Abraham King, administrator of John Mandeville.

Mr. POTTER. This claim has been several times reported on favorably by the House, and in the Court of Claims it was rejected simply because of the statute of limitations, its merits being undoubted. The court was bound by the statute of limitations. In accordance with the principle established by the action of the House on a precisely similar claim, some time since, I move that it be laid aside, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The following adverse reports were laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the several reports from the Court of Claims be respectively concurred in:

An adverse report (C. C. No. 135) upon the petition of Robert C. Thompson, administrator of William Thompson;

An adverse report (C. C. No. 139) upon the petition of Ellen Martin, heir-at-law of Francis Martin; and

An adverse report (C. C. No. 140) upon the petition of Francis Nadeau, heir of Basil Nadeau.

The next case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 161) upon the petition of Abraham R. Wocley.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that this case be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The next case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 11) upon the petition of Cyrus H. McCormick.

Mr. READY. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] have given this case their special attention; and as neither of these gentlemen is now in his seat, I propose that the case be passed over for the present.

Mr. WORTENDYKE. I hope that course will be pursued.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the case will be disposed of now.

Mr. CHAFFEE. If it is passed over it will be impossible to go back and take it up to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We had better pass upon it at once, and get the case out of the way.

Mr. WORTENDYKE. The member who has charge of this case is not in his seat. I wish him to have an opportunity to present the case to the committee, and therefore I trust there will be no objection to passing it over informally.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will make a definite motion in reference to this case. I move that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not see why the request of my friend here [Mr. WORTENDYKE] cannot be granted, and the case passed over informally. The gentleman who has the case in charge is not in the House, and it would be only courtesy to grant the request.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is any feeling in the matter, I will withdraw my motion.

The case was passed over informally.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up and reported, being an adverse report (C. C. No. 21) upon the petition of Cassius M. Clay.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the case was passed over informally for the present.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up and reported, being an adverse report (C. C. No. 30) upon the petition of William Neill and others.

Mr. COX. I would like to have that case laid aside informally, and I will state the reasons for it. The gentleman interested in this case are from my district; they were here the other day, and the first intimation they had that this adverse report was before the House I gave them. I furnished them with the report and the papers, and they are now examining them at Columbus. I expected to have heard from them before this. I ask to lay the case aside until I hear from them in relation to this matter.

The case was passed over informally.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up and reported, being an adverse report (C. C. No. 31) upon the petition of Thomas Phoenix, Jr.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the report in this case be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Military Committee has under consideration the claim of this gentleman, and likewise the report made by the Court of Claims; and although they are of opinion that the report of the court was right, the claim not being one which is recognized under the law, yet they have prepared and now have a bill upon the Private Calendar for the relief of the claimant.

The case was passed over informally.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up and reported, being an adverse report (C. C. No. 81) upon the petition of David Myerle.

Mr. FLORENCE. The report in this case is a long one, and I do not think it advisable to have it read. The Senate have this case under consideration now. This is not an adverse report, considered in its true light. I will read a paragraph from it.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Make your motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I move that the report be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up and reported, being a bill (H. R. No. 64) for the relief of Richard H. Weightman.

The bill, which was read, provides that there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $4,500, as mileage and per diem compensation to Richard H. Weightman, as agent, claiming to be a Senator in Congress from New Mexico for the second and part of the first sessions of the Thirty-First Congress.

The report, which was read, states that at the close of the Mexican war, the military government which had been established by the President of the United States in New Mexico, was temporarily continued, in the absence of other forms of government, with the presumed consent of the inhabitants of that Territory. The people of the Territory, however, soon memorialized Congress for the usual form of territorial government, and sent an agent, Hugh N. Smith, to Washington for that purpose, with the style of territorial Delegate. Congress did not at that time grant the territorial government asked for. Abandoning hope of obtaining such government, and viewing the de facto government as anti-republican and obnoxious, the people of New Mexico, following the example of Tennessee, Vermont, and other States, formed, in 1850, a State constitution, in the absence of all sanction of the General Government, and presented it to Congress, asking for admission into the Union. Mr. W. S. Messervy, who had been chosen a Representative, and Mr. Richard H. Weightman, who had been chosen a Senator in Congress, came to Washington as the agents of New Mexico, the latter as early as August or September, 1850, bringing with him a copy of the new constitution, and placing it in the hands of the President of the United States, who transmitted it to Congress on the 9th September, 1850. Mr. Messervy arrived at Washington at a later date, and attended the second session of the Thirty-First Congress; they both remaining until the 4th of March, 1851.

Congress refused to admit New Mexico as a State, but at the same time organized the present territorial government for that Territory.

For his services Mr. Weightman has never received any compensation, while Mr. Messervy, who cooperated with him, has been paid, in mileage and per diem, for services during part of the time Mr. Weightman was here—that is, during the second session of the Thirty-First Congress—$2,460. Mr. Smith, too, who preceded him as territorial Delegate, has been paid $2,000 mileage, and per diem amounting to five dollars per day, from the time of his arrival at Washington till his claim to a seat was rejected by a vote of the House of Representatives. This apparent discrimination against Mr. Weightman seems to have resulted merely from a series of casualties. On four separate occasions an appropriation to compensate him has passed through the Senate. On one of these occasions the appropriation was lost in committee of conference; on another, with the loss of the deficiency bill of 1854, to which it had been attached; and on two others by a vote of the House during the hurried hours immediately preceding the close of the session, unfortunately without an opportunity having been afforded of drawing the attention of the House to the facts of the case. At the last Congress the Committee on Territories for the House reported a bill for the payment of this claim, which was read a first and second time, but was not reached on a third reading, and went off with the mass of unfinished business on the Calendar of the House. The sum appropriated was $2,460 for the second session. His claim is almost precisely identical with that of Mr. Messervy, he having served longer and rendered more service; and it is strengthened and supported by all the precedents in similar cases known to the committee which have ever arisen in the decisions of Congress.

Should it be questioned whether a Senator elect can properly be paid per diem and mileage prior to the admission into the Union of the State represented, it may be answered that the practice in such cases has uniformly allowed the compensation; and, as examples, the committee refer to the payment of per diem and mileage to Messrs. Benton and Borton, as Senators elect from Missouri, commencing November 14, 1820, though Missouri was not admitted into the Union until August 10, 1821; to the payment of per diem and mileage of Messrs. Lyon and Norvell, as Senators elect from Michigan, commencing December 7, 1835, though Michigan was not admitted into the Union until January 26, 1837; and to the payment of per diem and mileage to the Senators from California, from the time they arrived in Washington, as agents to secure the admission of California into the Union, to the date of such admission as a State. It is true, that until the admission into the Union as States, of Missouri, Michigan, and California, the gentlemen claiming to be Senators were, in fact, merely agents of those communities, seeking their admission as States; but in this respect Mr. Weightman's position was precisely the same, and justice would seem to require that he should be paid, under the same rule, as agent. Territorial Delegates from Utah and New Mexico (Messrs. Smith and Babbett) were compensated for their services as agents before territorial governments were granted to those Territories. The appropriations to compensate Mr. Messervy, a Representative under the proposed State constitution of New Mexico, and Messrs. Norvell and Lyon, Senators, and Crony, Representative, from Michigan, were passed upon prior to, and without reference to the fact of, the admission of the State governments for which they acted as agents.

The committee are therefore unable to perceive why the claim of Richard H. Weightman should be constituted the only exception to the general rule. The hardship and injustice of such a decision has thus far been the result merely of accident and oversight. They find that he presented his credentials to the Senate on the 12th day of September, 1850, and they believe that from that day to the 4th March, 1851, he is entitled to per diem and mileage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have, I believe, upon several occasions, when the Private Calendar was under consideration on objection day, objected to this bill being reported by the unanimous consent of the committee to the House. I did so, for I believed, upon the examination of the case, that there were no merits in it. And, though I have no regard for precedents further than I am satisfied that the precedent itself is right, yet I think there is no precedent even which covers the case now under consideration. It is claimed that Mr. Weightman came here claiming to have been elected a Senator to the Congress of the United States from the proposed State of New Mexico in 1850. Now, sir, in the reports referred to in this case, there is not one of a person coming here claiming to be a Senator when a State applied for admission, and was paid his per diem and mileage when the State was not admitted. There are cases where, after the admission of the State, and the Senators were qualified, they were paid from the time they presented themselves to the Senate. I am not aware of any precedent where any gentleman ever came here claiming to be a Senator from a State, and was paid as a Senator when that State never was admitted into the Union.

Again, the report states that Mr. Messervy was paid as the agent or delegate from that Territory. I concede that; but Mr. Messervy came here perhaps as their agent or as their delegate to this House, and not to the Senate. Is there any case upon record in the history of the Government where any gentleman has ever appeared as a delegate from a Territory to the Senate of the United States, and where he has been paid for attendance on the Senate of the United States, claiming to be the agent or delegate from a Territory?

Again, there is no case upon the records of the country, so far as I am aware, where more than one agent or delegate has been paid for any one Territory at the same time. I do not know who made what purports to be the constitution of New Mexico. I do not know when they had a State government organized, or when they had a Legislature which was competent to elect a Senator, and send him here.

Again, I believe it is stated in the report that Mr. Messervy was paid $2,460 for one session, and $2,000 for the other session. Perhaps it is stated in this report that Mr. Weightman presented his credentials to the Senate on the 12th of September. That was but a few days before the session expired. Is it intended, then, by this bill to pay him mileage for that session, and mileage also for the second session—for it proposes to appropriate $4,500 to pay Mr. Weightman this claim.

I think myself there are no merits in the case. I think from the report itself, a case is not made out which entitles him to the benefit of the act proposed to be passed for his benefit. These are the reasons which operated on my mind when I withheld my assent—an assent which would at least be a tacit indorsement of the correctness of the claim—to report it on objection day by the unanimous consent of the committee to the House for passage. It is now before the committee, when every gentleman has a right to express his opinion, and it must be determined by the vote of the committee, and with them I leave the case.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I would be glad to have the attention of the committee for a few minutes to this case. I have examined it in committee, and my impression is that my colleague is mistaken in all the points he has made in his argument. I have examined the records of similar instances, and I am satisfied that there never has occurred an instance in the history of the Government, similar to this, in which the applicant has not been paid, with the solitary exception of that of Mr. Weightman. My colleague [Mr. Jones] says that there are no precedents. The report briefly and concisely states the facts in regard to precedents, and I will briefly advert to some of them.

However, before I do that, let me call the attention of the House to the particular state of facts existing. When the Mexican war terminated, there was a military government in New Mexico, which had been established as a matter of necessity, by the President, during the pendency of the war. This was a sort of government which ought not to have continued longer than possibly could be avoided. It was a tyrannical, inconvenient, and oppressive military government. The people of New Mexico, as soon as the war terminated, desired to have a territorial government extended over them. They asked for a territorial government in the usual form, and elected a Delegate to this House—a Mr. Smith. They petitioned Congress to give them the usual territorial government. Congress refused or failed to do it.

There are other facts in that connection to which I desire to call attention. The then Administration of the Federal Government indicated a purpose to resist the policy of establishing territorial governments in New Mexico and Utah. The people of New Mexico saw this. They were very anxious to get rid of their military government, and when they were thus satisfied that they could not obtain a territorial government, they proceeded to form a State government. They elected a State Legislature, and a member to this House, and Senators to the other branch of Congress. My colleague says that he has no evidence of this. I have the evidence of it. It is before the committee, and if my colleague has it not it is his fault, and not the fault of the records of the country. These men came here as agents for the purpose of securing the admission of the new State into the Union. Soon afterwards, Congress determined to establish a territorial government. The compromise measures of 1850 were passed, and these provided territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico. Mr. Messervy, who came here as an agent to ask the admission of New Mexico into the Union as a State, got his bill through, and was paid. Major Weightman's bill passed the Senate, but was never reached in the House. It fell with the unfinished business of the session. It has been passed four times by the Senate; but by some casualty it has failed to pass the House.

My colleague says that there is no precedent where a man has been elected as a Senator and paid as an agent prior to the admission of a State into the Union. Here is a case in point, the case of Michigan. The report states it thus:

"The appropriation to compensate Mr. Messervy, a Representative under the proposed State constitution of New Mexico, and Messrs. Norvell and Lyon, Senators, and Cromy, Representative, from Michigan, were passed upon prior to, and without reference to the fact of, the admission of the State governments for which they acted as agents."

The Michigan Senators and Representatives were paid from December, 1835, although Michigan was not admitted as a State into the Union until January, 1837. This is a case in which gentlemen elected as Senators came here as agents to secure the admission of a State into the Union, and were actually paid per diem and mileage for service commencing two years before the admission of the State into the Union. The bill making the payment was acted on before the act was passed admitting the State into the Union. This is a case in point. It is true that Michigan was subsequently admitted into the Union; but at the time the per diem and mileage were paid it was not admitted as a State. The case of those Senators stood before the country just as this case stands now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I said that I was not aware of any case where any agent asking the admission of a State into the Union, and claiming attendance as a Senator, ever was paid for that attendance when the State had not been admitted.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. What does that matter, when I show a case where mileage and per diem were paid when the State was not admitted? The State of Michigan stood, at the time payment was demanded and made, just as New Mexico stands. The Senators were paid for services some two years previous to the admission of the State into the Union; and Major Weightman claims for like services here.

My colleague says that he never knew of two agents being paid for asking the admission of the same State. Look at the Michigan case, where two agents were paid for doing that very thing. There is another precedent in the Missouri case. There Messrs. Benton and Borton were paid as agents for services during nearly two years prior to the admission of the State into the Union. I believe in that case the claim was not acted on until after Missouri was admitted; but Congress went back and paid them from the first day they came here as agents, commencing in 1819, when Missouri was not admitted, until 1821. Messervy and Weightman both claimed to be agents of New Mexico. What is the difference? They were sent here for the same special purpose—to ask the admission of the State into the Union. The people wanted to get rid of their military government. When they saw that the Administration of the Federal Government was in favor of receiving them as a State, instead of granting them a territorial government, they sent these agents here. Messervy has been paid; Weightman has not.

Mr. LETCHER. What I want to know is this: who elected this gentleman a Senator?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. He was elected by the Legislature of the State government of New Mexico. His colleague, whose name was Cunningham, was an officer of the Army, and being an officer of the Army, he did not quit his post and come here, and hence has never made any application for pay.

The impression has gone out, and I have been asked the question this morning, if Major Weightman was not at the time of his election an officer of the Army? He was not. His colleague, Mr. Cunningham, was an officer of the Army, and for that reason, I presume, he has never applied for compensation.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Was not Major Weightman an officer of the United States in New Mexico prior to his election?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. He had been; but at the time of his election he was a private citizen.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. But he had been an officer of the United States previous to that?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. He had been. My colleague [Mr. Jones] adverted to the fact that Mr. Messervy was paid $2,400; and that Major Weightman's claim is larger than that. The difference is this: that Major Weightman was here during portions of two sessions of Congress, whereas Mr. Messervy was here only one. Their compensation is placed upon an equal footing. Mileage is given to each of them; and each of them is allowed five dollars a day. It seems to me that they ought to have been paid eight dollars a day, but inasmuch as it is found that in all other cases—in the case of the gentlemen from Missouri and Michigan, and in the case of Mr. Messervy—only five dollars a day had been allowed, it was thought better to conform to the established usage, and make it five dollars a day instead of eight. But Major Weightman's compensation is precisely the same, in proportion to the time he was engaged, (including mileage for two sessions,) that has been paid to his colleague, Mr. Messervy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact, that the impression that there are no precedents is a mistake. There never has been an instance similar to this in which the Government has not paid mileage and per diem. This is the only solitary exception. I have some doubts as to whether the payments ought to have been made in any of these cases; and if we were about to commence de novo, if I did not find just such cases, I doubt whether I would vote for the bill. But when I find that every gentleman who has presented himself before the Government under similar circumstances has been paid, I feel that, as a matter of justice and equity, it is due to Major Weightman that he should be paid also.

If, sir, there are any other objections which gentlemen entertain to the bill, and will suggest them, I will endeavor to ascertain whether they are not equally erroneous.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. How many people were there in the Territory at the time?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I do not remember now the amount of population. I am told that it was sixty-one thousand at the time. The point that I would call attention to is this: that the people there first wanted a territorial government. The indications here were that they would not get it. The President, in his message, it will be well remembered, whether rightly or not, took an adverse view of the subject. He thought that these new acquisitions from Mexico ought to be kept out until admitted as States. This impression reaching the people of New Mexico, they resorted to what they considered the only alternative left them, and organized a State government, and endeavored to get into the Union as a State. But, in the mean time, Congress had determined to pass the compromise measures of 1850, and to bring New Mexico in under a territorial government.

Now, inasmuch as the precedents of the Government have been as I have described them, and as this document discloses; inasmuch as Major Weightman's colleague has been paid—and he was here longer in service and used more active labor in endeavoring to accomplish the end for which the two were sent here—it does seem to me to be wrong that he should be made the only exception to the rule.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I have listened to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ZOLLICOFFER,] and I must confess that if I could be induced to vote for a claim upon the mere ground that claims of a similar nature had been passed, I should be inclined to go with the gentleman in voting for this bill. But, to my mind, the whole practice which has heretofore been had was, as the gentleman himself suggests, an improper one. It seems to me, sir, that whatever might have been its propriety with respect to those Territories in which there was a population seeking admission of its own motion, there would be great objections to a case in which it is impossible to say what were the wishes of the people—as the mass of them did not speak the English language—and who originated and carried on the movement which gave rise to the apparent action of the people on which the claim is founded. And this would be more especially the case when the person whose claim is in question was an officer of the United States, or went to the Territory in that capacity, and in consequence of the position in which he was placed by the Government, may be presumed to have had peculiar influence in getting up such a movement. Now, to my mind, this practice of paying persons coming here, who are placed in such a position by their connection with the public service that they can produce results, like those presented in New Mexico in this instance, and contribute to the apparent formation of governments when, perhaps, were it not for the position which they occupy, there might have been no such movement, is dangerous in itself, and, I think, improper to be continued.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. The gentleman will allow me to say that, although Major Weightman had been, some time prior to his election, a paymaster of the United States in New Mexico, he was, at the time of his election, a private citizen. But it does seem to me that, when you come to look at the particular state of facts existing there at the time—the facts which I recapitulated a moment ago—there was a propriety in the people of New Mexico thus selecting a man whom they thought might have influence with the Government. He had been an officer of the Government; he was then a private citizen. But it was not unnatural that they should suppose, when they were anxious to get rid of the military government, that, if they should select him to come on and endeavor to secure some form of civil government for them, he would be more successful than if they were to send a man unknown to the authorities of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is a propriety on the part of an organized community, standing in the position in which the people of New Mexico stood with respect to the Government of the United States, sending to the Congress of the United States an agent. It seems that they did send an agent. Now, if there had been any authority of Congress, if there had been any territorial government created, that gentleman would have had a certain legal character; he would have been vested with a certain legal position. And when no territorial government had been created, I would be disposed to look with favor on one who came here as the Representative of a people so situated for the purpose of playing the part of their agent, in the absence of any law.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I understand the gentleman to say that there had been no territorial government created there?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Not at that time.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. The people of New Mexico had endeavored to form a territorial government.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. But not by authority of Congress.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Of course. I understand it. The people of New Mexico came under the authority of the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. They occupied a particular position. It was the practice of the Government of the United States to extend over a people so situated a territorial government. Such a territorial government had not yet been created there by the legislative power. It was, I think, perfectly competent for that people, under these circumstances, to select an individual who should come near the Government of the United States as their agent. I think it right and proper to so regard him. I think it right and proper for the Government of the United States, at any future time, when they establish a territorial government or when they admit it as a State, to recognize that peculiar capacity of the individual, and to pay him the same amount that it is usual to pay to persons occupying such a position under the authority of law; for the Delegate of a territorial government, created by act of Congress, is nothing more nor less than an agent of the people constituting that community.

Now, in this particular instance, there was a person who stood in that relation to the people of New Mexico, and in that relation to the Government of the United States; who was so recognized, and whose services in that capacity were paid in the usual manner. This bill, however, proposes to go further, and to pay a person claiming to occupy the position of a Senator—a Senator from a State which has not yet been admitted; which not only has not yet been admitted, but with respect to which there has been no act of the kind which is now called an enabling act.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. The gentleman will recollect that the usage heretofore, in the case of Missouri, in the case of Michigan, and in one or two other instances, has been to appoint three agents. A member of the House and two Senators have been elected in each of those three instances; and all three, coming here and claiming pay as agents, have been paid by the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. And in those instances the communities sending them, at the time the step was taken, had the population necessary to authorize them to be admitted into the United States, and to authorize them to elect a Representative on this floor; and in those instances, I imagine, the persons who presented themselves were members of the communities for which they acted. But, in this instance, the population of New Mexico was almost entirely made up of those who did not speak our language. This person and the other who was associated with him in the election to the Senate, in view of that people being admitted as a State into the Union, were American citizens, who were not identified with that population and who had no connection with it. Mr. Weightman had only become part and parcel of that community because he was sent there by the United States in an official capacity in the public service. He saw fit, afterwards, to abandon the service. I know nothing about the gentleman, but it is very possible that his withdrawal from the service of the United States may have had some connection with the subsequent proceedings in regard to the character of that government.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Let me state here that that cannot be so, for the reason that the office of paymaster, which was vacated by Major Weightman, was filled by Mr. Cunningham, who was also elected as his colleague to ask admission into the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I did not state this as a thing that I know. I do not know the gentleman, nor am I acquainted with any of the circumstances. But the fact that he was an officer of the United States, and the other fact that his colleague was also an officer of the United States, ought, of themselves, to show the extreme danger of countenancing anything of this character. Now, I have heard it stated, and I presume it is true, that there have been other instances in which officers connected with the Army of the United States at one time, who were placed in a particular position with regard to a people, have appeared here for the purpose of producing some action on the part of Congress with regard to the creation of territorial governments.

There is an instance of that kind now pending, as I understand. I have seen something in the papers; and I have seen it, perhaps, in the proceedings of Congress, with regard to the creation of a territorial government out of a portion of this very Territory of New Mexico, which is advocated and urged by a gentleman occupying the same position in regard to it as Major Weightman occupied with regard to New Mexico.

Now, I think that the doubt expressed by my friend from Tennessee in regard to the original propriety of these allowances, is more than a doubt in my mind. I am inclined to think that it was wrong; and, as I have a conviction of that fact, I am not disposed, at this time, to support this bill. I am not disposed to abandon what I conceive to be a proper principle, merely because that principle has been violated before. I do not want to go any further with that practice, and it is my purpose to vote against the bill.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. In connection with the doubt which I frankly expressed, it may be proper for me to say that if there ever was a people who were entitled to have an agent to represent them here to ask for admission under the peculiar circumstances which I have stated, it was that people. A Territory, situated as that was, needed here an agent to explain the circumstances, and to show the reasons why their petitions should be granted. The people sent agents, in conformity to the established usage in such cases; and one of them has been paid. It does seem to me that the claim of the other ought not to be rejected.

With these remarks I submit the question to the committee.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I now ask the unanimous consent of the committee to take up the adverse report (C. C. No. 21) upon the petition of Cassius M. Clay, which was passed over informally on my request, in order that I might prepare a bill for the relief of the claimant. I ask, also, permission to introduce the bill.

No objection being made, the case was taken up; and

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill for the relief of Cassius M. Clay.

The bill, which was read, appropriates the sum of $783 35, being a full restitution of the amount of a judgment rendered against said Clay by the circuit court of Jefferson county, Kentucky, for a trespass committed by him in the execution of an order of his military superior, while in the service of the United States, and which said Clay had paid. It also appropriates the sum of $760 to said Cassius M. Clay, for property lost by him in the Mexican war, in consequence of having been compelled, by order, to abandon it with a view to the public service.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. An original bill cannot be introduced in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the Committee of the Whole may originate a bill as well as any other committee. The report of the Court of Claims is before the committee, and the gentleman from Kentucky offers a bill as a substitute for the report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the Chair hold that we can go back upon the Calendar without unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asked, and obtained, unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAY. I have only a few words to say to the committee, in explanation of this bill. The claims which it embraces, and which it gives Mr. Clay indemnification for, have been repeatedly before this House. The first section of the bill provides for the payment of an amount of money which had been paid by Cassius Clay, under a judgment rendered against him, for a trespass committed by him, by order of his superior officer, while he was in the service of the United States.

The second section provides payment for losses sustained by him in Mexico, while under order to make a forced march, by which he was compelled to abandon his property.

The first item of the claim has been reported upon favorably several times by the committee of this House; and the second item has also been reported upon favorably. I think that both items are perfectly just; and I hope that the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JEWETT. What was the trespass?
Mr. CLAY. Whilst Captain Clay's regiment was in Louisville—the regiment commanded by Colonel Marshall, now a member of this House—a lieutenant was ordered to proceed to a certain house of ill-fame in Louisville, Kentucky, to arrest some deserters. The squad of men under the command of this lieutenant was fired upon from the house and one or two men and one or two horses were killed. Captain Clay was awakened in his tent in the middle of the night and ordered by Colonel Field, then in command, to enter the house and bring in the deserters. In obedience to that order he took his command, surrounded the house, broke open the door and brought back the deserters. For thus obeying the order of his commanding officer, he was sued in the court at Louisville by the person to whom the house belonged, and judgment was recovered against him for trespass, which he paid. It is to pay him that amount which he paid in obedience to the writ of the court at Louisville, and in the prosecution of his duty in carrying out the commands of his superior officers, that the first section of the bill is intended. The amount is some seven hundred and odd dollars.

The claim which he originally made for property which he had lost was for $1,373. The committee of this House, however, refused to grant him that amount, but allowed him in their report the smaller amount of $760, which is the amount contained in the second section of this bill. The articles of property which he lost are enumerated in the report, and were considered by the committee only such as were proper for an officer of the Army to have.

Those items are winter and summer clothes, sash and epaulets, bedding, camp and clothes chests, kitchen and table furniture, one horse, founedered by soldiers riding, and dead, one horse taken by the Mexicans, one mule, two dueling pistols and a revolver, worth, altogether, $760. The property was lost many years ago. All the items have been satisfactorily proved and are all allowed by the Committee of Claims of this House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I desire to move to strike out the second section of the bill. I agree entirely with the gentleman as to the propriety of passing the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield the floor?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I thought the gentleman had concluded his remarks.

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I agree entirely with my friend from Kentucky, that the amount provided for by the first section of the bill should be paid; every principle requires that it should be paid. But I am equally convinced that it would be improper to pay the amount provided for by the second section. It would be establishing a principle that I think would be extremely dangerous, and one that ought never be recognized under any system of government. When a person engages in the military service, it is not to be presumed that he is to be compensated by the public for the loss of his private property incident upon the ordinary contingencies of a military campaign. It is one of the risks which he takes when he engages in the military service.

Mr. MASON. I think the gentleman does not understand the facts of this case. Captain Clay was compelled to abandon this property by the order of his superior officer.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. In the military service, in almost all instances, the private baggage of the officer has to be abandoned to the care of others. In making rapid military movements it cannot be avoided. No human art or contrivance can prevent the risk of these losses. It is incompatible with the discharge of military duties that a man should be at all times in charge of his own property. It must be intrusted to other public agents; and that is one of the ordinary risks which, in my view, is taken by persons who engage in the military service. I do not, however, wish to discuss the question. I thought, when I took the floor, that the gentleman from Kentucky had concluded his remarks.

Mr. CLAY. In reply to my friend from Louisiana, I will merely observe that perhaps he is right in the general principle; but I think that there should be exceptions. I think it would be unjust and improper that a gentleman should be allowed for all the baggage and all the articles which he might lose in time of war. But there are certain articles necessary—absolutely necessary—to the soldier and to the man, which, under ordinary circumstances, he might take with him; and which, under all circumstances, perhaps, he ought to have with him; but which, certain exigencies, like those in the case of Captain Clay, prevent him from carrying with him. The Committee of Claims threw out all those articles which one would ordinarily have, but which might not ordinarily accompany his person, and allowed Captain Clay for the articles only which he was obliged to abandon on account of the forced march that he was ordered to make. I think that in his case an exception ought to be made to the general rule.

But, sir, I do not wish to discuss the question, or to detain the committee. I would merely state, in addition to what I have already said, that the Court of Claims, in reference to the first item, at least, have recognized its justice; but have stated that they had no legal power to accede to the claim, and recommend it as one eminently addressed to the equity of Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Was Captain Clay an officer of a mounted regiment?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Before my colleague takes his seat, I would call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] to the fact that $340 of the $760 provided for in the second section, which he proposes to strike out, is for Mr. Clay's horses, which he left behind him when he was ordered away from camp.

Mr. CLAY. There is one other circumstance which I will mention. Before the end of this forced march, which Captain Clay was ordered to make, he was taken prisoner, so that he never returned to the camp to look after his baggage and effects; he remained a prisoner for many months.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have got the account before me, and it does not appear what portion of the account has been allowed, or is proposed to be allowed. Here is "one gold watch, cost $350."

Mr. CLAY. That is stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Here is "two suits of clothes, (new,) sixty-five dollars each, $130."

Mr. CLAY. That is stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. "Twelve new shirts, five dollars each, sixty dollars."

Mr. CLAY. That is stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. "One hunting rifle, thirty-five dollars."

Mr. CLAY. That is stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. "One horse, founedered by soldiers riding, and dead, $150." This is an irregular trespass on the party, not by authority of anybody, and, most certainly, not a liability for which the United States could be held responsible. Was this just a horse that was useless in camp, and that the boys took in hand for a frolic?

Mr. CLAY. How could the owner of this horse take care of him while he was a prisoner?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know anything of that.

Mr. CLAY. This horse was left under the charge of the officers of the United States while his owner was a prisoner, and the horse was lost while in their charge.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman how many horses this captain was entitled to? I see he lost one, taken by the Mexicans. I see, also, that he had a mule. He also lost two dueling pistols and one revolver, worth $120.

Mr. CLAY. It is stated all round that this officer was entitled to have these horses—one for himself, one for his servant, and a baggage mule, all of which he lost.

The reading of the report was called for.

The report was read, as follows:

Cassius M. Clay vs. the United States.

Opinion of the court, delivered by Blackford, J.:
The petition in this case contains two distinct demands. The first demand is as follows:

During the late war between the United States and Mexico, your petitioner was a captain in the service of the United States. He was attached to the Kentucky regiment of cavalry under Colonel Marshall, and, preparatory to departing for Mexico, was stationed at or near Louisville, Kentucky. On the third of July, 1846, the day before said regiment embarked for Memphis, a guard, under the command of Lieutenant Sartin, was ordered to Louisville to apprehend and bring in deserters, a considerable number of whom were said to be in a house of ill-fame, belonging to or kept by one Eliza Bowles. Lieutenant Sartin proceeded to the execution of the order. He was dressed in his uniform and accompanied by the guard which he commanded. On arriving at the house indicated, he was not only denied admission, but fired upon from the house. Two of his men were wounded and a horse killed. He returned to camp, reported the circumstances, and, in addition to what has been above stated, added that some were supposed to be killed in the encounter.

About one or two o'clock in the morning, your petitioner was awakened in his tent by Colonel Field, then in command, who ordered him to take a reinforcement, to enter the house and bring in the deserters.

Your petitioner, being a subordinate officer, felt himself imperatively bound to obey the orders of his superior in authority. Anticipating, from what had previously occurred, that resistance would be made, the house was quietly surrounded, and orders given that all the doors should be simultaneously broken open. This was what he deemed a prudent order, calculated as well to effect the object which was to be accomplished, as by the promptness of the movement to prevent the effusion of blood. His orders were obeyed, but it appeared that the deserters of whom he was in quest, had escaped through a back way. No man was found on the premises but one by the name of Steed. The soldiers, who were exasperated at the conduct of the inmates of the house on the previous evening, were with great personal difficulty on his part, prevented from taking summary vengeance upon Steed and Mrs. Bowles. He succeeded in protecting them from personal injury, and not only did his conduct receive the commendation and approval of the commanding officer under whose orders he had acted, but Mr. Steed expressed his personal thanks and gratitude for this protection which he had been able to afford him.

Your petitioner further shows that after his return from Mexico a suit was instituted against him for this alleged trespass by Mrs. Bowles, alias Lang, and a verdict rendered against him, upon which judgment was pronounced, which, in October, 1848, amounted, principal, interest, and costs, to the sum of five hundred and thirty-three dollars and twenty cents, which he has paid.

The prayer of this first part of the petition is, that the claimant may be reimbursed the amount recovered against him as aforesaid. There is no legal ground for that claim. The Government does not undertake to indemnify the officers of the Army as to damages which may be recovered against them in cases like the present.

Supposing the order, which is not very distinctly stated, to be that the claimant should break open the house of Mrs. Bowles for the purpose mentioned, it was no justification for the trespass, because the order was unlawful. An officer is justifiable in acting under the order of his superior officer, if that order is legal, (2 Stat. at Large, 361;) but not if the order be illegal. (Mitchell vs. Harmony, 13 Howard, 137.)

There is nothing in the petition to show that Colonel Field had any authority to order the house to be broken open. If it was necessary so to enter the house to search for deserters, the proper authority to do so should have been obtained from a civil magistrate. It appears from a document, made part of the petition, that in the suit in which the judgment was recovered, the claimant's plea of justification, under said order, was held to be insufficient, on the ground that the order was unlawful; and that decision is no doubt correct. We are therefore of opinion that the Government is not legally bound to indemnify the claimant against the judgment. There are cases in which Congress has relieved military officers, acting under unlawful orders, from judgments rendered against them. Mitchell's case, (10 Stat. at Large, 727,) cited by the claimant's counsel, is such a one. But the power to relieve in such cases belongs, we believe, exclusively to Congress.

The other part of the petition is as follows:

In November or December, 1846, the claimant was ordered by Colonel Marshall to disperse, by a forced march, a band of robbers who were threatening the train from Camargo to Monterey. Upon reaching the point where it was supposed that his services would be required, he was ordered to Monterey; from Monterey to Saitillo, by General Marshall; from Saitillo to Palomas, by General Butler; from Palomas to Encarnacion, by Major Gaines. At this last place he was taken prisoner. Under these circumstances, all the baggage and property which he had with him in Mexico were lost, including many valuable papers. The actual cost of the articles thus lost amounted to upwards of thirteen hundred and seventy dollars. The items are set out in a memorial to Congress, which is made part of this petition.

This last mentioned claim, which is for the value of goods taken by the enemy in time of war, cannot be sustained. Vattel, in speaking of damages to real estate caused by the enemy, says: "All the subjects are exposed to such damages; and woe to him on whom they fall! The members of a society may well encounter such risk of property, since they encounter a similar risk of life itself. Were the State strictly to indemnify all those whose property is injured in this manner, the public finances would soon be exhausted, and every individual in the State would be obliged to contribute his share in due proportion, a thing utterly impracticable." (Vattel's Law of Nations, chapter 15, section 232.) We think the reason of that rule is as applicable to the seizure of personal property as it is to damages to real estate. The present claim is not founded on any general law, and this court therefore furnishes no remedy for the loss.

There will not, therefore, be any order for testimony in this case.

Mr. BONHAM. Before the motion be put, I beg leave to say a word. It is proper, beyond doubt, that the first section of the bill should be adopted; but I submit that the second section should not be. If private property of officers is to be thus paid for by the Government, you will have applications at the next Congress for at least one million dollars. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] who commanded a division on the southern line of Mexico, lost a large supply of commissary stores. There was scarcely an officer in the service who has not lost private property. They have lost their supplies, their camp equipage, their mess-chests; and it has not unfrequently happened that the commanding officer of a train has been under the necessity of throwing them away. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] will be agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I think it is perfectly clear that this bill should pass, and, as far as the second section is concerned, I think that allowance should be made for the loss of the horses. I think allowance cannot be made for the rest on any sound principle. There is a special law making the United States responsible for horses lost in service; but it has been settled over and over again that for private baggage, &c., lost in the service, the Government does not pay compensation. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] will fix the value of the horses, and will modify the amount contained in the second section, by leaving in it simply the value of the horses, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the second section may be stricken out, and the matter referred to a committee.

Mr. STANTON. But it does seem hardly worth while to be making two bites of a cherry. It is hardly worth while to have the matter sent before a committee, if the gentleman will consent to modify it as I suggest. I think there will be then no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. But how are we to settle the value of the horses?

Mr. CLAY. The value of the horses is ascertained.

Mr. MASON. I think the object of the gentleman from Ohio has already been attained, for the committee has docked the claim down from $1,300 to $700.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] how many horses a captain is entitled to?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. He is entitled to three, I think.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there not a law providing for the payment of horses lost in service?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. LETCHER. And why cannot the gentlemen be paid under that law, instead of coming here.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have not given much attention to this matter, but I would say to the gentleman from Virginia that the Government pays only for horses killed in battle, to the extent of $200, and the Government also compensates officers for their horses, when they are delivered into the hands of the quartermaster, and when they are separated from their horses. But the general law of this country does not permit allowances for horses, except those that are killed in battle.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think it will be perceived, on looking over this gentleman's schedule, that the committee has stricken off all of those items that relate to property that a man might well carry about his person, and has allowed only for those articles that belong to him in the camp, and which he was compelled to abandon when he moved forward. The whole affair is a mighty small one to have a discussion about; but since we have the discussion, we may as well come to some point about it. Here is a gold watch, $350—that is struck off; two suits of clothes, $130—that is struck off; twelve new shirts, $60—that is struck off; one hunting rifle, $60—that is struck off; because these were things attached to his person.

Now, we are asked why he does not go to the Third Auditor's office to get pay for his lost horses? For the simple reason, in the first place—and I know it experimentally—that it is extremely difficult to get a claim through that office. Probably no man knows that fact better than I do, for I presented to that office the claims of the soldiers of that regiment, until I became so disgusted with the practice of the office, that I abandoned the attempt in despair, and refused to present any more claims.

But this claim does not fall within the law. It is not a claim for horses lost in battle; not for horses lost in the service; not for horses lost for want of proper provisions, not for horses lost from being fed exclusively upon corn. This is a claim peculiarly within the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky is addressing himself to this side of the House, and not to the Chair.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am addressing the Chair, but I am irresistibly attracted to address the particular part of the House to which there is need that I should address myself. [Laughter.] This is a small affair, and does not give Mr. Clay half of what he ought to be allowed. His case is simply this: He was ordered to go out of camp, expecting to be gone only from morning to night. He was ordered to go out and dislodge a set of highwaymen who threatened one of our trains. He took a party of men, and rode some twenty or thirty miles. When he arrived at the designated point, instead of being allowed to return, his superior officer ordered him to go to Monterey upon service just as pressing as the former service. I believe it was to guard that very train, which was threatened, on to Monterey. When he got there another superior officer ordered him to go to Saltillo. On arriving at that point he was ordered to advance some twenty or thirty miles, when he was taken prisoner, and taken to the City of Mexico. All his property was left in the camp, and was lost. I do not know what became of the horses. They were probably pressed into the service, and rode to death. He suffered in an enemy's country, and when he comes to Congress for relief, we find a grave discussion arises; and in that discussion we spend more money than the whole claim amounts to. He has been here an applicant since 1848—the simple matter of ten years.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, at the time of the capture of Captain Clay, he was not in command of that regiment?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I was the colonel of the regiment, and I had, I suppose, the command of it wherever it might be. I had, technically, the command of Captain Clay when he was in the penitentiary in Mexico.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I only wished to know, as I supposed it possible there might be a good claim against my friend from Kentucky, as commander, for the loss of the property, and none against the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I was not bound to take care of Mr. Clay's horses. [Laughter.] I do not think I ever saw his horses. This is a small matter, and I think we had better pass it at once.

Mr. MILLSON. I know but little about the facts of this case; but if I understand it—and if I do not I beg gentlemen to correct me—the case involves a principle to which I never can give my sanction. And first, I ask my friend from Kentucky, who has just taken his seat, if he was the military superior who gave the order, the execution of which subjected Mr. Clay to the judgment for damages, for which he now claims indemnity.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No, sir; I was not in my camp when the order was given; but I witnessed the trial in the civil court, and I remember well that the judge decided that if Mr. Clay committed a trespass upon this lady, or upon her property, by order of the United States, he could not plead the order in bar in the court. The judgment in the case of Lieutenant Mitchell—in which case the Government of the United States paid a hundred-odd thousand dollars to save him from the judgment—was rendered in New York. The suit was brought in consequence of his having executed the order of Colonel Doniphan; and that case is quarrior pedibus with this.

Mr. MILLSON. The great mistake in the matter is that into which the gentleman has just fallen—in supposing that Mr. Clay has been made to pay the amount of this judgment because of the execution of the order of the United States. Sir, it was because he had disobeyed the order of the people of the United States. He had done an act which the court pronounced illegal. The people of the United States, when asked for indemnity, declared that that act should not have been performed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman—being more practiced in military affairs than myself—permit me to ask him whether he would admit the principle that when a colonel in the field gives an order to a lieutenant colonel to do a thing, to storm a house or to take a position, the lieutenant colonel may turn round to him and say, “in my opinion it is not a legal order, and I will not execute it?”

Mr. MILLSON. I am surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should ask me such a question. The oath of every military officer is, that he will obey the legal orders of his superior officers. The oath which he takes to obey the legal orders requires him to disobey the illegal orders. And why, sir? Because he has sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. In swearing fidelity in the discharge of his duties, he impliedly swears that he will execute the orders of his superiors which are legal.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he considers it proper for every soldier in the Army to constitute himself a judge of constitutional law, and to inquire into the legality of every order of his commanding officer? Would not that be subversive of military discipline?

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir. It is the bounden duty of each officer or soldier to know the law; and if he mistakes the law he does so at his peril. And the principle that a subordinate officer or soldier is bound to obey the peremptory order of his superior officer, because he has no right to inquire into the legality of that order, is one which is repudiated even in England; for there, although by their constitution the King can do no wrong, yet the order of the King furnishes no justification for the act of the minister. The humblest subject of Great Britain is liable to the punishment adjudged to any infraction of the law, even when he violates that law at the command of his sovereign. British history will show many cases where British ministers have been brought to the block because they preferred to obey the command of their sovereign rather than the command of the law.

It is unquestionably true that a man is sometimes placed in a very difficult and embarrassing position, when, for instance, he is required by the order of a military superior to perform an act which he supposes to be in violation of the law. (He may not be very well skilled in the law, and it may be a question of doubt whether the act is an infraction of the law or not. Perhaps the most prudent course for the subordinate to pursue, would be to obey the command given him by his military superior, where he is not well assured that he is required to violate the law; but if he is required to violate the law, if the act does involve a violation of the law, he cannot plead the order of his superior, nor ought he to be allowed to plead the order of his superior, for that would be in substance to say that a dispensing power is given to a military officer which is not given to any other officer of our Government, and that the laws of the land may be set at naught whenever a military officer may think proper to disregard them or to command their violation. I say that that is a principle which prevails nowhere; and although in general it is perhaps prudent and politic on the part of the inferior to obey the command of his superior, which he does not know will violate the law, yet I put the inquiry to my friend from Kentucky, whether, if a subordinate officer or a private soldier be commanded by his military superior to do an act which he deems in violation of the law, he ought to do it; and if he does do it, whether he ought to be exempt from punishment?

Mr. CLAY. It seems to me that this case is not so plain a case as the one the gentleman has mentioned. The fellow-soldiers of Captain Clay were fired upon, and some of them were killed. Those who were in the house were the first trespassers. Captain Clay was ordered to go there, and to bring away deserters who were in the house. Every endeavor was made to save the sacrifice of life. The house was surrounded, the doors were burst open, the house was entered from which the shots came that killed his fellow-soldiers, and the deserters were arrested and brought away. For this he was brought before the court, and mulcted in damages. The gentleman comes here now, and talks of constitutional principles. This is not a question of compensation for ten years' extra back pay which gentlemen were willing to vote the other day, and for which, I believe, a bill was passed; but it is doing an act of simple justice. The court may have been wrong, and I think it was, when it compelled Captain Clay to pay this sum of money for having acted in the discharge of his duty. On the question of trespass, the first trespass was from the house. Their fellow-soldiers had been shot down from it, and they had a right to go into it to arrest the murderers and deserters who were there.

Mr. MILLSON. I understand that my friend from Kentucky is brought to concur with me in the doctrine I have announced, and that this is an attempt to dispute the application of that doctrine to the present case. Notwithstanding the astonishment that was expressed when I first announced the principle I was undertaking to maintain, I find that the gentleman from Kentucky himself is not willing to contest that principle, but simply declares that, in this particular case, it was not an act of clear and flagrant violation of the law.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me suggest a point pertinent to the question. The objection is not that Captain Clay acted without orders, but that he acted contrary to law. The gentleman misunderstands the oath taken by an officer. The gentleman says that the officer swears to obey and support the Constitution of the United States. It is a curious fact that he swears to no such thing. This is the oath as it is prescribed in the Army regulations:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear or affirm, (as the case may be,) that I will bear true allegiance to the United States of America, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies or opposers whatsoever; and observe and obey the orders of the President of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles for the government of the Armies of the United States."

Mr. MILLSON. I think if the gentleman will look a little further, that he will find that the officer is commanded to obey all legal orders.

Mr. CURTIS. The oath of an officer of the Army is different from that taken by any other officer of the Government.

Mr. MILLSON. I understand that the interruption is to show me that the officers are not required to support the Constitution; and next, that there is an obligation on the part of officers and soldiers to obey the orders of their superiors whether they be legal or not. The Constitution requires every executive officer to take an oath to support the Constitution. If the gentleman will turn to the Constitution—which is as obligatory, I presume, as any act of Congress can be, which is as much the law of the land as any act we can pass—he will find that:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution."

All executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States! And I tell the gentleman that, not only officers of the Army, but officers of the militia of all the States are required to swear to support the Constitution. So much for the obligation upon officers of the Army.

Mr. STANTON. I desire the gentleman from Virginia to answer me a question. Suppose a soldier refuses to obey an unlawful order: he is arrested, tried by court-martial, and ordered to be shot for mutiny, and the sentence is executed. Are the court and the officers who execute the sentence guilty of murder?

Mr. MILLSON. Sir, if he is decided by a court having jurisdiction over his case to have refused to obey a legal order, the gentleman's question has no force. If he is condemned to be shot, it can only be upon the ground that he has disobeyed a legal order. And if the court undertake to sentence a man to punishment for disobeying an illegal order, all I have to say is that every member of the court justly subjects himself to punishment by the people of the United States or their agents and executive officers.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman does not meet my question. Suppose the soldiers who execute the sentence of the court-martial should be indicted for murder would not the judgment of the court-martial be a good plea in bar?

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman knows very well that if the court has jurisdiction over the case, the officers who execute the judgment are protected. Because it is not a question whether the court errs or not. It is a question of power—a question of jurisdiction, and the ministerial agents of the court are protected by the jurisdiction which the court has over the question. A court having no authority may pronounce a right judgment, and yet he who undertook to execute the judgment would be subject to punishment. But the court, having jurisdiction of the case, though they pronounce a false judgment, yet their agent is authorized to carry out the execution thereof.

But, sir, I was about to answer the remaining point of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS.] I infer, from his reading an extract from the law, that the gentleman is maintaining the obligation of an inferior to obey even the illegal order of a superior. Sir, I have never heard such doctrines maintained in the American Congress before, and deeming them dangerous and mischievous, I trust I may never hear them again. What! The representatives of the people, the law-making authority, maintain the obligation of any one of the citizens of the United States to regard a military officer as superior to the law, and that where the law says one thing, and a colonel or general shall say another, it is the command of the officer that is to be obeyed, and not the command of the people! What is law but the expression of the will of the people?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Let me suggest a case. When Commodore Paulding ordered his seamen to go ashore in Nicaragua and take William Walker and his men, does the gentleman consider that those seamen would have been authorized to tell the Commodore that he commanded them to invade the sovereignty of another Republic, and that they would not go?

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will perceive that he is only addressing to me difficult questions of constitutional law, when the question of principle is one altogether clear. It may be that there might be considerable doubt whether an act would be a violation of law or not. It might admit of considerable inquiry whether the particular thing commanded to be done was a violation of law or not. But upon the general principle, where there is a law prohibiting the act, that act cannot be legalized by the command of any subordinate or executive officer of the United States, unless gentlemen are prepared to maintain the doctrine that there is some man in the country superior to the law.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say that I do not, as he seems to suppose, take ground so broad as to say that a man would be justified in executing an order obviously and unquestionably unlawful.

Mr. MILLSON. Very well. Now, I understand that all these gentlemen have abandoned the ground which they seemed to occupy. They admit now that no man would be justified in obeying an order plainly and palpably illegal. The gentleman from Iowa now admits that, and begs that he shall not be considered as contending for the principle that every man is bound to obey an order which is palpably opposed to law.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman suffer me to interrupt him for a moment? None of us have taken the ground that Captain Clay could have pleaded Colonel Field's order in bar to the action of trespass. The fact that he was fined in the court of justice for the trespass, is evidence that in the civil tribunal the military order afforded him no justification. But he comes back to the Government and says to them: "I executed the order of my superior military officer, and for so doing was arrested and fined by the civil tribunal; I now throw myself upon your discretion whether I shall be paid or not."

Mr. MILLSON. I understand that; and it amounts just to this: The man comes here and says to the people of the United States, "I have disobeyed your orders because I preferred to obey the orders of one who is not allowed to do what he required me to do; you have punished me for this disobedience of your laws, and I ask that you who have imposed the punishment upon me, will now indemnify me against it." It is actually an appeal to the people to indemnify a violator of the law for the very violation of law which caused the people to punish him.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLSON. These constant interruptions have obliged me to occupy much more of the time of the committee than I intended when I rose, but I cannot refuse my colleague.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Chairman, I feel some curiosity to ascertain how my colleague can square the argument which he now makes, with the action of Congress in regard to the remission of the fine imposed upon General Jackson for proclaiming martial law in New Orleans. The fine was refunded in that case—interest as well as principal.

Mr. MILLSON. Does the gentleman ask me a question?

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask my colleague how he squares the argument which he now makes, with the action of Congress in the precedent to which I have referred, and with the vote which he gave on that question?

Mr. MILLSON. I gave no vote, that I know of, upon that question.

Mr. CLEMENS. Did you not vote in favor of refunding the amount of the fine to General Jackson?

Mr. MILLSON. I do not know that I did; and I was about to say to my colleague that if he thinks he can embarrass me in the argument of a question of legal principle, by asking me how I will reconcile the views I take in this case with the views somebody else has taken in other cases, all I can say is that I have come here for no such purpose.

Mr. CLEMENS. I disclaim any intention to embarrass my colleague. I asked the question for my own information, because my colleague takes very high ground when he denies the authority of Congress, by the passage of any law whatever, to countenance the action of an officer of the Army who has the presumption to come before the law-making authority and ask to be indemnified for a violation of law.

And yet, in the case of General Jackson, when a fine was imposed upon him by Judge Hall for declaring martial law in New Orleans, Congress refunded that fine, and did so on principles of constitutional law.

Mr. MILLSON. I tell my colleague that I am not going to discuss the propriety or impropriety of such a law. I have nothing to say about that question now, and my colleague must excuse me from undertaking to reconcile the view which I take of this case with the view which other gentlemen may have taken of other cases in times past.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia how the discipline of the Army could be maintained if inferior officers were allowed to judge of the legality or illegality of orders?

Mr. MILLSON. My friend from Mississippi asks me how the discipline of the Army could be maintained, if subordinate officers and soldiers were allowed to judge of the legality or illegality of orders? I will ask him, on the other hand, how can the laws of the United States—how can the laws which the people make—be maintained, if they can be trampled upon with impunity by any of the subordinate agents of the Government?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I can answer the gentleman. If a superior officer gives an illegal order, charges can be preferred against him, and a court-martial can be ordered to try him.

Mr. MILLSON. Indeed! indeed! Then you would punish the man who thinks an illegality, and you would let escape the man who does the illegality. The man who merely says that a particular thing may be done innocently is to be punished, while the man who commits the violation of law escapes all punishment—and on the ground that he is under the order of his superior!

Sir, I have argued the legal bearings of this bill to very little effect, if I have not succeeded in showing the committee that the common superior of all these officers is the law.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Allow me to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia. I understood him to state that, where a court has jurisdiction, if it makes an order, and there is an error of judgment, the person executing it would not be responsible. Now, I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia whether the case before us is not embraced in this principle; whether, in point of fact, the "court," in this instance, had not jurisdiction, so as to justify the execution of the order made by the officer to whom it was directed? In the military service of the United States, power is given to the officer to retake the deserter. It was the first duty of the colonel commanding this regiment to retake the deserters. He had jurisdiction over the case, and the order was given by him to effect a legal object. Now, without entering into any of the minutiae, I think that this consideration is sufficient at least to enable us to dispose of this particular case.

Mr. MILLSON. The committee must have perceived that I am made to deliver a speech in spite of myself. I expected to detain the committee only five minutes, and yet I have been led into such a range of discussion by the numerous interruptions of gentlemen, that I have been under the necessity of discussing this question tediously, I fear, and at much greater length than the committee have patience to endure. I intended to say but very little, and that was simply to declare that I could not vote for this bill, at least for the first section of it. I know but little of the other section; I do not know whether I have any objection to that or not; but I do object to the first section of the bill, because it involves principles mischievous and new in the legislation of this country. It seems to sanction a departure from the law by an inferior officer, on no higher warrant than the order of his military superior?

And how is he his superior? He is only his superior because the law has made him so; and the same law which makes the colonel the superior of the captain, restrains the captain from doing anything which the law itself prohibits. Gentlemen ask how this can be reconciled with the maintenance of discipline in the Army? Why, sir, I have already stated that there are very many questions that give serious embarrassment to the person having to solve them. Will the gentleman from Mississippi maintain here that, if a slave should commit an offense against the laws of Mississippi, he would not be punished because he did so by the order of his master?

Mr. BARKSDALE. No, sir.

Mr. MILLSON. He does not maintain that doctrine; nor did I suppose he would. Certainly the order of a master affords no justification to the slave for the violation of the laws of the land or the commission of any crime; and yet does not my friend see that the poor slave is placed in a very pitiable condition of embarrassment? He may say, "if I perform the act I subject myself to the halter, and if I do not perform the act I subject myself to the punishment my master may inflict upon me. Now what am I to do?" Sir, in that condition is many a common sailor and soldier placed, and many an officer. If he knows and feels that the act he is about to commit is a violation of law, he is safe in refusing to obey the order. If he has doubts, why, perhaps, the safer plan is to obey the command of his superior; but he does so, taking the risk. He cannot plead his ignorance of the law, because the maxim has been established that ignorance of law excuses no one.

Mr. SEWARD. I am going to vote for the first section of this bill, and I propose to give my reasons for doing so. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is not denied here but the superior officer had ample jurisdiction to control the subordinate, and that the order to arrest the deserters was legal. The only question of illegality in the case arises from the fact that a private citizen felt that he was aggrieved by having his house broken into. That was illegal. There is no doubt about the superior having authority to give the order. The only question involved in the case is, did Mr. Clay act in good faith in carrying out the order of his superior? If he did, and if, in doing so, the rights of some private citizen were interfered with, by which Mr. Clay made himself liable to the civil authorities of the country, and for which he had to respond in damages, then, as a question of good faith, on the broad principles of equity, I say that the Government ought to indemnify him, and cannot fail to do so without dishonor.

Mr. CLAY. I do hope that we will dispose of this small matter at once. This poor fellow [laughter] for whom I have brought in this bill, has lost a great deal; but I venture to say that if he had known that so much valuable time of the committee would be consumed by it, perhaps he would never have allowed it to be brought in. I trust we will take the question.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Clay belongs to the district I have the honor to represent; and although there is a wide difference between us in political sentiments, I have no doubt of the justice of the claim. I hope the committee will waste no more time in its discussion, but will act immediately. I have had the circumstances which surround that claim presented to me before, in my own district, by the gentleman, and I believe he would make no statement but what is true. I shall vote for the claim, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

The question was put, and the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, to strike out the second section—

Tellers were called for, and ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS of Indiana, and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 81.

So the committee refused to strike out the second section.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not desire to discuss this matter further; but as the gentleman from Iowa quoted a law, a short time since, from recollection, and I told him I did not think the law would sustain him, I wish to read the law. It is this:

"Any officer or soldier who shall strike his superior officer, or draw or hit up any weapon, or offer any violence against him, being in the execution of his office, on any pretense whatsoever, or shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The chairman has decided that this committee has the power to originate a bill. I think that it is a dangerous precedent to set now upon the adverse report of the Court of Claims; and I would move, if it is in order, that this adverse report, together with the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims, the Committee on Military Affairs, or some other committee; I am not particular which.

It is, sir, the first time within my recollection and experience here when the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar has ever attempted to originate a bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. As this case will doubtless be drawn into a precedent, and there will be a number of applications made to the next Congress for payment for horses lost under similar circumstances, would it be in order to move to amend the bill so as to make it general—to substitute for this private claim a proposition providing for all similar cases?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that an amendment would not be in order to a private bill of this character to provide for any general class of cases. This is a private bill, standing upon its own merits, and such an amendment as the gentleman from Virginia has indicated is not in order.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to ask the Chair if the amendment which I send up would be in order?

The amendment was read, as follows:

And that John C. Anderson, of Green county, Alabama, be allowed the sum of $1,000, the value of a negro servant, the property of said Anderson, lost during the service of the latter as lieutenant in the Mexican war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] expect that, after the two or three hours' discussion we have had upon this subject, the House will be enlightened by referring the bill to a committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot answer the question.

The motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, was disagreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass—ayes 87, noes 38.

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL.

The next bill upon the Calendar was House bill No. 197, for the relief of Charles J. Ingersoll.

Mr. FLORENCE. My colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS], who reported this bill from the Committee of Elections, is unavoidably absent; and I hope, by consent, it will be passed over until his return.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope we shall dispose of it. It has been killed half a dozen times already, and I hope we shall kill it again.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is but justice to give my colleague an opportunity of explaining why he introduced it again.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope the committee will concur in the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman who reported the bill is unavoidably absent; and I will say further, that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], who reported it from the committee in the last Congress, and takes quite an interest in it, is confined to his house by sickness. I hope that by general consent the bill will be passed over, and permitted to retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. Objection is made to a postponement, and the committee must proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that the gentleman from Virginia objects to the bill being passed over?

Mr. LETCHER. I do, sir.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection, for the reason that my colleague [Mr. STEPHENS] is confined to his room by indisposition, and that he feels much interest in the passage of this bill. He might desire to submit some views in favor of its passage, and I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust sincerely the gentleman from Virginia will not resist the second appeal made to him. Two gentlemen are absent who are both interested in the bill, and anxious for its passage.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I feel no particular interest in the bill myself, but I know that my colleague does.

Mr. LETCHER. I, too, feel some interest in the bill. Here we have been harassed, and worried, and bedeviled by this thing, year after year, ever since I first came here. It is here now for the seventh time, and I think it high time that we should make some final disposition of it. I believe the principle is all wrong, and so believing, I shall oppose it now; and I want it disposed of in one way or the other.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no interest in this bill, but I was upon the Committee of Elections in the Thirty-Third Congress, and, if I remember correctly, it is a very meritorious claim. I think we might find fifty precedents for it upon the statute-book.

I will state the case as I remember it, and if I am incorrect I hope some gentleman will correct me. Many years ago, there was a contest for a seat for Philadelphia, between a gentleman of the name of Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll, the claimant. Ingersoll came here with the certificate of the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, by which he was prima facie entitled to a seat upon this floor. By the statute of Pennsylvania the certificate of the judges is equally good, and I believe Naylor had the certificate of some of the judges of election. He came here in advance, and was allowed to take his seat.

Mr. LEITCHER. If the gentleman from Georgia will stop, I will compromise with him, and let the bill go over. [Laughter.]

The bill was then passed over informally.

The next bill on the Calendar was House bill No. 203, for the relief of George W. Biscoe.

The bill directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to audit the claim of George W. Biscoe, for indemnification under the first article of the treaty of Ghent for the loss of the schooner Speedwell, captured by the British forces within the waters of the United States, provided the said amount does not exceed $2,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The next bill on the Calendar was a bill (C. C. No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mc. McIntosh, of the United States Navy.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Captain McIntosh, of the United States Navy, $204 95, the difference between the sum paid him as commander on other duty and that due him as an officer attached to a vessel for sea-service.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NICHOLS reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back, with a recommendation that they be concurred in, several adverse reports from the Court of Claims; and also to report back House bills No. 21, No. 197, No. 203, and No. 80, with a recommendation that they do pass; and also House bill, No. 164, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am not in the habit, Mr. Speaker, of seeking the indulgence of the House; but as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEITER] made a speech yesterday alluding to a speech of mine on another occasion, I hope the House will give me three minutes to answer him.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Five minutes!"]

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman has alluded to an old speech of mine, delivered in 1844, in my first congressional term here. I had no knowledge then of Captain Rynders and those other gentlemen referred to, except what I got from the New York Tribune, the New York Courier, and other papers that are now supporting the party of the gentleman from Ohio; and I took it for granted that their statements were true, and therefore made those allegations. But an acquaintance of several years with that gentleman has satisfied me that Captain Rynders is a highly honorable man. [Loud laughter.] If gentlemen laugh, and thus occupy part of my time, I shall ask another minute. [Laughter.] I will say this, Mr. Speaker: that he and I have spoken from the same stand, and I have every reason to be proud of him as a political associate. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. What stand?

Mr. CLINGMAN. At Tammany Hall, and other places. Well, I found out that this gentleman had been badly slandered by the newspapers; and one reason why I left the party that I was acting with in 1844 was, that there were some very bad newspaper organs leading it astray by their falsehoods and misrepresentations. The Democratic party undoubtedly had bad elements in it, which would have spread like a cancer in a sickly and feeble constitution, and destroyed it; but having a vigorous constitution, instead of succumbing under them, it sloughed them off, and about the time that the gentleman from Ohio and some other Free-Soilers and Abolitionists left it, I went into it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether, in 1848, he was not at Philadelphia?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes, sir, and in 1848, in the contest between General Taylor and General Cass, I found that the old Whig party in the North had become abolitionized, and I took ground against them that very winter, about the time of the developments by Gott's resolution to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District, for which they all voted. I left the Whig party and joined the Democrats. The latter threw out their abolition elements, and they have gone over to the other side, and I now stand in a purified party, [laughter,] and I rejoice in its soundness and devotion to true principles. There are some very good men yet out of the party, but I hope they will come into it. I have tried it for several years, and I find it just the best party we have had since the foundation of the Government, [laughter,] or at any rate, in our times.

Mr. LEITER. I just desire to say that I very cheerfully accept the explanation made by the gentleman from North Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. One word on this subject. This is a contest between my old friends. I recollect very well when the gentleman from North Carolina was working side by side with us. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. And I quitted the party because I was not willing to work in the harness with the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GIDDINGS. He left us for the very best of reasons. He left us for our good. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Ever since I left your party, you have been beaten. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. And we took in our friend from Ohio over there, [Mr. LEITER,] and several others of like character. We were glad to supply the place of my friend from North Carolina, and we were glad he left us.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, near me, says I ought to have another minute, but I suppose it is not necessary. But I will say his party have been beaten ever since I left it. It is good for them, no doubt, to be soundly beaten, as I have helped to do, and I hope it will be reformed by the corrections and castigations given them, and that they will reform and purify them in time. Their vote for the Crittenden amendment is the first fruit of their conviction and repentance, and the best evidence of their reformation. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

REPORTS FROM THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The following adverse reports of the Court of Claims, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were then taken up and disposed of, as indicated below:

An adverse report (C. C. No. 116) upon the petition of Augustine Demers and others, administrators of Francis Chaudonot.

The Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims. The report was concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 123) upon the petition of Joshua R. Jewett, heir of Joseph Jewett.

The Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BISHOP. I was not present when this case was taken up in committee; but it is similar to many other cases which have been referred to the Committee of Claims, and I move that this be also referred to that committee.

The motion was not agreed to.

The report was then concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 127) upon the petition of Robert Harrison.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the report be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The report was so referred.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 130) upon the petition of Abraham King, administrator of John Mandeville.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the report be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The recommendation was agreed to.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 135) upon the petition of Robert C. Thompson, administrator of William Thompson.

The Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims.

The report was concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 139) upon the petition of Ellen Martin, heir-at-law of Francis Martin.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

The report was concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 140) upon the petition of Francis Nadeau, heir of Basil Nadeau.

The Committee of the Whole recommended a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims.

The report was concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 141) upon the petition of Abraham R. Woolley.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the report be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was so referred.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 31) upon the petition of Thomas Phoenix, jr.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the report be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was so referred.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 81) upon the petition of David Myerle.

The Committee recommended that the report be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The report was so referred.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 21) upon the petition of Cassius M. Clay.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole have reported a bill for the relief of Cassius M. Clay, as a substitute for the report of the Court of Claims, with a recommendation that it do pass. The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLAY. I move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to have the gentleman from Kentucky give us an opportunity to have a vote upon striking out the second section.

Mr. CLAY. I cannot withdraw my demand for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There was a motion made in committee to strike out both sections. Cannot a vote be taken on the same question in the House?

The SPEAKER. The motions were voted down in committee, and they reported the bill with a recommendation that it do pass. Nothing can be voted on in the House but the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. BONHAM. I would inquire if it is in order to read two sections of the act of 1849 in relation to compensation for lost horses?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, if objected to; as the previous question has been demanded.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CLAY demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The main question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burr, roughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Coffin, Conner, Conning, Covode, Criggin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Has-kin, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ricaud, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, Tappan, George Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Augustus R. Wright—97.

WAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bonham, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hawkins, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, McQueen, Miles, Milson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, and Wortendyke—63.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that his colleague, Mr. DAVIS, was absent in consequence of sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. MATTESON.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, stated that Mr. FOLEY was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. WALBRIDGE made a similar statement in regard to Mr. LEACH.

Mr. KEITT stated that Mr. GARNETT had been obliged to leave the city on business, and had paired off with Mr. HICKMAN; and that he (Mr. KEITT) had paired off with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that Mr. SINGLETON was necessarily absent, and had paired off upon the police bill with Mr. POTTLE; and on the Kansas question with Mr. LEACH.

Mr. HOARD stated that Mr. THAYER was absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, having voted "ay," withdrew his vote, and stated that he had paired off until Wednesday next with Mr. BRANCH upon the Kansas and Minnesota questions, and, for fear of misapprehension, preferred not to vote at all.

Mr. QUITMAN stated that he voted against the bill on account of the second section.

Mr. HILL stated that he voted against the bill because he believed the allowance made in the second section was too large; he would have voted for a portion of it.

The result of the vote having been announced, as above recorded,

Mr. CLAY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RICHARD WEIGHTMAN.

A bill (H. R. No. 64) for the relief of Richard Weightman was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and the question being "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. BISCOE.

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of George W. Biscoe, was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CAPTAIN JAMES MC. MINTOSH.

A bill (H. R. No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mc. McIntosh, of the United States Navy, was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SEWARD. I made objection this morning to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] that the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, should be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I now wish to withdraw that objection; for, as we are going to adjourn soon, it is important to the country that the appropriation bills should be disposed of.

No further objection being made, the bill, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken up, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting the report of Colonel Johnson, surveyor of the southern boundary line of Kansas, with map; and also a communication in answer to the resolution of the House of 16th March, 1856, transmitting the reports of Captains Sitgreaves and Woodruff.

The communications were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF NEW YORK.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, to divide the State of New York into three judicial districts.

Mr. STANTON. I object. We had better do things in the regular order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HILL. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes thirty-eight, noes not counted.

LYDIA FLETCHER.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask my friend from Louisiana to withdraw the motion to adjourn for a moment.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I withdraw it.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for the relief of Lydia Fletcher, for reference only.

Mr. STANTON. I object. We all have private bills which we want to introduce.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very singular that objection should be made. This is the second time I have been on the floor since I have been a member of the House. I shall object, hereafter, to everything.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, the House (at five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 17, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. H. CHAPMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 482) regulating the compensation of officers and marines of the revenue cutters, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the memorial of Thomas G. Clinton, for an amendment of the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. GREEN presented additional papers relating to the claims of J. C. Irwin & Co., and of J. and R. H. Porter; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a paper relative to the claim of Benjamin Page and Henry E. Page, heirs of Benjamin Page, deceased, to indemnity for French spoiliations prior to the year 1800; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for the adoption of the northern route in the construction of the Pacific railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KING presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that pensions may be granted to those who served in the war of 1812, and to the widows of those deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of James M. Rich, and others, heirs of Robert and John Montgomery, praying for indemnity for French spoiliations committed prior to 1800; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Knap, reported a bill (S. No. 272) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FOOT. The other morning I introduced a joint resolution changing the time of the meeting of the next session of Congress. I desire either to withdraw that resolution or that it may be laid on the table, and to introduce a bill to make the same provision, as I find that that course is in accordance with precedent. I therefore move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I now ask leave to introduce a bill on the same subject, and that it lie over for future consideration.

Leave was granted to introduce the bill (S. No. 271) fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. FOOT. Let the bill be read at length, that the Senate may understand it.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday of November next.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STUART. If there are no further petitions and reports, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the gentleman mean only for the morning hour, or for the day?

Mr. STUART. Only to dispose of the unfinished business—a little bill which can be passed in fifteen minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator that I will not object, if he will agree to lay it aside at one o'clock, if it be not disposed of then.

Mr. GWIN. I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Michigan, with the understanding that at one o'clock the special order shall not be interfered with. I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the special order at that hour.

Mr. STUART. The business of the Senate, I will say to the Senator from California, will take precedence at one o'clock; but it is a small bill, and I suppose it can be got out of the way in a very short time.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it in order for me now to move to postpone all prior orders in order to take up the deficiency bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be in order.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. GWIN. Would that supersede the special order at one o'clock?

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that it would.

Mr. GWIN. Then I must oppose that motion. The Pacific railroad bill has been postponed again and again, and I feel it to be my duty to insist on its being considered. If the deficiency bill could be disposed of to-day, I should have no objection to taking it up and passing it; but I believe there will be a debate of days upon it; and I feel myself bound to oppose taking up any measure that will set aside the special order which has been so long before the Senate. I do not wish to interfere with the appropriation bill if it will not take long.

Mr. HUNTER. If the deficiency bill is to be debated for days, there is the more reason for proceeding at once with its consideration. I cannot tell how long it will be debated. I think the Senate ought to take it up, and determine whether they will furnish these supplies or not. It is time it should be known one way or the other. I move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I will remark to the Senator from Virginia that it would not be strictly in order now to move to postpone the special order, which does not come up until one o'clock. When the hour arrives, and the special order is before the Senate, the Senator can move to postpone it.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill, and at one o'clock I shall move to postpone the special orders.

Mr. STUART. The motion I submitted is one that has precedence over that of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. But if I move to postpone all prior orders, mine will have precedence; and I make that motion.

Mr. STUART. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am averse to taking up the deficiency bill at present, for the reason that the information that was called for a day or two ago from the Secretary of War has not yet been sent to the Senate. I am unwilling to proceed, and I think the Senate ought not to proceed with its consideration until we are furnished with the information which has been called for by the Senate, and which I consider to be material.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state to the Senator that I believe the information will be here, probably, in an hour. I do not think that it is material. It is a mere call for copies of contracts, an abstract of which we have already in a published document transmitted in answer to a call from the House of Representatives. I think the Senate will have the information here long before the bill is decided upon, and we had better proceed with it at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator may be correct, but we cannot tell with certainty whether the information will be here in the course of an hour or of a day; and when it is here it will require some time for its examination. The Senator should reflect that there is more than one member of the Senate who would like to look into it. If he does not deem it material, I do. I think that the facts which may be developed in answer to the call which we have made, may be very material to the consideration of the bill—at any rate the Senate ought to have an opportunity to judge. And as this bill has been brought into Congress at so recent a date; and as the necessity for that portion of it which is disputed, was known just as well on the 1st day of January as it is known to-day, or ought to have been known and understood, there certainly can be no very great occasion for hurrying it now, when the bill was only reported yesterday, and when we are yet calling for information connected with it.

Why, sir, it is perfectly manifest that so far as the necessity for these supplies is concerned, on the principle upon which they are demanded, the Administration knew just as well on the 1st day of January what they should want, as they do to-day; and yet this bill did not come from the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives until within a very short time past; and when the recommendation went for it to that committee we do not know. It is a little too late when the matter has been so long delayed, and all the information on which it is founded has existed for so long a time, now to say, that to-day (especially when we are calling for information which is of so much consequence) it shall be pressed through. I do not believe it will be debated very much in this body.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator is mistaken in supposing that the necessity for it is not more pressing now than it was on the 1st of January. The necessity for it is increasing every day with the lapse of time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say that. I said the facts on which the necessity for it is predicated, were just as well known to the Government then as they are to-day.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. Some of the facts on which the necessity for the bill is predicated were as well known then as now, but others were not. Be that as it may, however, I think it is perfectly manifest, and I submit it to the Senate without debate, that we ought to decide whether there shall be further supplies furnished or not. If we do not mean to furnish them, there will be no use for sending out the troops we have recently authorized to be raised. If we intend to do so, we ought to do it as soon as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask whether even if we had the information alluded to by the Senator from Maine, there is any hope that we can dispose of the whole bill to-day? Does the Senator from Virginia believe that it can be disposed of in one day? I have no idea that it can.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no idea that it can. I can dispose of it so far as I am concerned, in one day. I have made up my mind. I do not know how long it will take.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Does the information called for relate to the entire bill, or to a very few appropriations in the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It relates to the most important part of the bill; and that is the appropriations for the Army.

Mr. HUNTER. The information called for is copies of contracts made by the Secretary of War in regard to transportation and subsistence. I think it will be down to-day. It certainly will be down before long. It is true it is not here now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then the information relates to one point. I imagine that every gentleman here believes we shall not get through with this bill in one day. There is a great deal of the bill not to be affected by this information. Why not go on and dispose of those portions of the bill in regard to which there is no necessity of waiting for information? Those parts of the bill, I presume, will take more than this day to dispose of. I do not see why we should not proceed at once to the consideration of those parts, and when we come to those sections of the bill in regard to which information is called for on the Senator's objection and declaration that he wants further information, they can be passed over, to be taken up the next time the bill is considered. Even if the information does not come until Monday, if on that day the Senator had not time to examine it, I should, for one, vote, and I suppose the other Senators would agree at once, that that particular section should be laid over until he had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. HUNTER. I would not press the Senate for a vote to-day in regard to those items on which information is sought. If we dispose of all the other items before the information comes, I shall be willing to lay the bill over till Monday. There are other matters besides that. There are amendments that will lead to discussion, probably. While I am up, I will say that I am informed by the Secretary of War, that the information will probably be here this morning.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This bill has just been laid upon our tables since the motion was made by the Senator from Virginia. I have not yet had time to examine it. I do not know exactly how many millions of money are appropriated by it, but I believe some ten million or more. It seems to me very unreasonable that we should be forced to act on such a bill before the members of the Senate can have an opportunity even to read it over and see what it is. It is known that very serious objections exist to this appropriation bill. It is charged, and, as I believe, truly, though I have not had an opportunity to examine particularly with regard to it, that a large amount of these appropriations arises out of contracts made without authority of law, and to support an Army which has been used without authority of law. It is charged, and proven by the statutes, that the Executive has been employing the Army of the United States for the last year, at great expense, in Kansas Territory, illegitimately, calling it a posse, and summoning thousands of men, at great expense—which we are now called upon to pay—from a remote portion of the Union into the Territory of Kansas. Besides, we have had an army wintering in the Rocky Mountains, which, I believe, is called a posse too, without any object, as I can conceive, in having that army there, for it would have been better to have started it this spring, from Fort Leavenworth.

I do not propose now to argue this question at all, but I say it is very extraordinary that an effort should be made to hurry through the Senate a bill which we have not had time to read, appropriating many millions of money—almost as many millions as it took twenty-five years ago to carry on the whole Government—and called a deficiency bill, before we have had an opportunity to read it; a bill which was only reported yesterday, and has been laid on our tables within the last ten minutes. I should like to have an opportunity to examine this bill. I am not upon the Committee on Finance; I have never read the bill over; and I should like to have an opportunity to look into it. I think it is an unreasonable haste to call it up on Saturday, with a view to action upon it. I hope the Senator from Virginia will let it go over until next week, so that we may have an opportunity to look into it, and to ascertain whether these appropriations are based upon authority of law, or whether it is a usurpation on the part of the Executive of this country which has created this great deficiency. If it is, I think the Senate may pause, and well pause, before it appropriates such a vast amount of money.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I am sure I do not desire to make any unreasonable request of the Senate; nor do I think I am asking anything unreasonable when I move to take up this bill for consideration to-day. It will be remembered that the Senate has determined to adjourn, finally, on the 7th of June. Now, if we are to adjourn at that time, it will be impossible for us to transact the necessary appropriation business unless we proceed more hastily than we have done heretofore, and use more dispatch.

In regard to this bill; it is the same that has been debated for so long a time in the House of Representatives, and copies of which have been sent here from the House of Representatives, and lying on our table for weeks. The only alteration recommended by the Finance Committee is, that we propose to strike out two items which were in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. In regard to the questions of law which are suggested, they have been before the country for months. It surely cannot be necessary to postpone the consideration of the deficiency bill in order to give gentlemen further time to make up their minds upon such a subject. I apprehend, when they come to examine it, it will not require the Senate long to determine whether the President has the power to post the troops at his own discretion, for that is all that has been done so far.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to correct the Senator from Illinois. This bill was ordered to be printed and laid on our tables, on the 12th day of April, and here is a copy of it—the House bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, with the Clerk's certificate. It was "read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed." I knew I had read a copy of it on the table of the Senate before. It was printed on the 12th of April, and the only difference between this printed copy, and the copy that has just been laid upon our tables, consists in the brackets put around paragraphs which the Committee on Finance propose to strike out. There is no other difference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Ohio has ascertained what the difference is, he has ascertained it since this debate commenced. The bill was not laid on our tables until after the motion of the Senator from Virginia was made, at least not on my table; and how the Senator from Ohio knows what the difference is between the bills, unless he has derived it from the statement made by the Senator from Virginia, I do not know. I have not had time to compare the bills. It is true, a House bill was printed and sent here, and referred to the Committee on Finance, and they have made some amendments to it. Now we have learned, by a statement made within a few minutes, something of what the character of those amendments is; but we have not had time to read and compare the bills since it was laid on the table as amended by the committee. The fact that a different bill from the one before us, passed the House of Representatives, does not contradict the statement which I made, that the bill upon which we are called to act has come here within the last fifteen minutes.

Mr. PUGH. Now, sir, if I took the Senator from Illinois on his own statement, he would be no better off. Suppose I had ascertained the fact to be that the bill just laid on our tables does not differ from the bill formerly laid on our tables, all his argument that we have had a copy only within the last five minutes, is gone; for we had before a copy which does not differ from this one. But the fact is that I listened better than the Senator; my recollection is that the chairman of the Committee on Finance said, when he reported the bill, that the only difference was that he proposed to strike out certain items. I think he made that statement.

Nor, sir, do I see any necessity for delaying this bill on account of the alleged information we are to receive from the War Department. There is no appropriation in this bill for any contract; it is simply an appropriation for the service of the quartermaster's and the commissary's departments. We shall have to pass some bill; we shall have to make some appropriation; and if Senators find that there are illegal contracts, made by usurpation of authority, and all that, let us annul them by joint resolution; but the bill must pass in some shape at last; and if it is to be passed at all, it must be passed very soon.

I do not stand here to bandy responsibilities with the Administration. Let us admit, for the sake of the argument, all the Senator from Maine has said, to wit: that the Administration knew in the month of January, as well as they know now, the necessity of this bill; let us admit, for the sake of the argument, that the Administration have not done their duty: we ought to do our duty. Now, the Administration send us the bill; it is urged upon our attention as a matter of the utmost importance; and especially as we have ourselves authorized an increase of the forces for the short period of eighteen months, if there is to be any benefit at all from that increase of the troops, the Government must be furnished with the means, for if the regiments are not going to march now, we had better repeal the law we have lately passed.

I see nothing in any allegation of illegal contracts, or of fraudulent contracts, or of executive mismanagement, or of usurpation, that ought to prevent the Senate from taking up this bill for consideration. What the particular items may be, what may be my individual opinion on them, I shall not now express; I do not know that I am prepared to express any opinion, but it seems to me that if we are to pass the bill at all, we ought to take it up immediately, and proceed to its consideration. I shall, therefore, vote for the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am a little surprised at the information which the Senator from Ohio communicates to the Senate, that this bill has nothing to do with any contracts which have been made, or are proposed to be made, by the executive department, because in the information that has been furnished to us by the Administration we are told that it has relation not only to contracts that have been made, but to contracts that are proposed to be made by the quartermaster's department. This being the case, I am, as a member of the Committee on Finance, rather "struck up" with this new information derived from the Senator from Ohio on that point. It is at war with the information we have received from high quarters.

Now, sir, all I have to say in regard to the information which I desire, is that on the Senator's own showing, it is important; because having relation, as it has, to the appropriations contained in the bill, I want to know what the contracts are, how they have been entered into, what they are for, and the power of the Government in relation to them, and what the Government proposes to do. It is hardly an answer to me to say that this information, so distinctly relating, as it does, to the subject-matter, has nothing to do with the question whether we will supply the very money asked for by these contracts. I think it has a material relation to that very question. But, sir, I am not disposed to argue the merits of the bill now, or to denounce the Administration for what it has done, and what it proposes to do, in advance. The motion now before us is a simple question of taking up the bill, and upon that I do not deem it proper to go into a matter of that description.

I wish to remark, however, in illustration of what I said before, that there are some things which look a little strange to me. All the information upon which is predicated the necessity of moving on Saturday instead of moving on Monday in relation to this bill, upon the ground that there is an immediate and pressing urgency, was, as I shall be able to show, and am able to show now, if I choose to go into it, just as much in the possession of the Administration months ago as it is to-day, and was in their possession weeks and months before they moved at all for obtaining supplies by this bill. The answer which has been made is by no means a satisfactory one. If the Government which presses upon us this great urgency (for I take it to be a pressure by the Executive Government) has been resting quiet under a knowledge of the facts, it is a proof, to my mind, that the urgency in fact does not exist to the extent now pretended. If they knew all the facts so long a time ago, and yet did not move, they are driven to this difficulty: either the urgency does not exist, or they are stupidly ignorant and neglectful of their own duty. Gentlemen may take which horn of the dilemma they choose. If the Administration possessed the information and did not move, it proves either that there was no necessity for moving, or that they knew nothing about their own duties; or, if they did know, it proves that they were most neglectful of them and have most grossly neglected them up to the present time.

Now, sir, what do I ask? The Senator from Ohio says he is ready to proceed; he understands it all, because this bill was laid upon his table, I do not know how long ago—some two or three weeks since. Why, sir, everybody here knows that we do not look at and study bills which are laid on our tables, printed by order of the House of Representatives, until they come before us, and have been under the consideration of our committees. Look at the heading of the bill in this case: "In the House of Representatives." When was it brought here?

Mr. PUGH. It says, "In the Senate of the United States."

Mr. FESSENDEN. When?

Mr. PUGH. On the 12th of April.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That cannot be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The bill was printed under an order of the Senate of the 12th of April, and, if I understand aright, the Senator from Maine, in his committee, has had before him a printed bill, printed by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That might have been so; but it is a House bill. The bill has never been in the Senate at all until it came from our committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then it is alleged that there are but two changes from the House bill. Besides, it is agreed—at least, I believe the Senator from Virginia has assented to it—that any section upon which the Senator from Maine wants information, shall be passed over. Moreover, the bill was printed in the other House long since, and the whole of it, with the discussion on it, has been printed in the congressional debates of the House. It has been printed four times. That is the fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My honorable friend is talking upon a point to which I have not yet alluded; and it is unnecessary to that of which I am speaking, to say that certain other things may be done. I was alluding to the fact that the bill, as a Senate bill, has not been before us at all until it came here this morning.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator is mistaken. Here is a copy—he can read it—printed by order of the Senate, after it passed the House, with the Clerk's certificate at the bottom. If he will read the copy, he will see he is in error.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio seems determined not to understand me. I say it is not our habit to read over House bills—at any rate it is not mine—or to consider them, until they have been referred to a committee of the Senate, and considered by that committee. This bill never came into this body until the first of this week. It came here from the House, I think, on Monday last. It was referred to our committee, and we took it up on Tuesday. What is so easy to be comprehended and apprehended by the Senator from Ohio that he is ready to go on with it now, understanding all about it, took the committee three days of close, careful examination of documents, and figures, and subject-matters in order to enable them to understand it, so as to report upon it to the Senate. The Committee on Finance is so composed, it is made up of such dull men, that it takes them three days to do what the Senator from Ohio can do off-hand without any trouble at all. The bill has been under the careful consideration of that committee, with its distinguished, able, and experienced chairman at the head.

The bill, as I have said, came into the Senate for actual examination, from the committee, only yesterday. A call has been made for information which the chairman will bear me witness I wanted to call for in the committee, and he suggested to me that the bill might be reported, and I might get my information before the bill was debated, by a call from the Senate itself. This was his own suggestion, to which I assented. The bill came in, therefore, on my assent, under these circumstances, it being understood that I might get the information here, if I desired it, before proceeding with this bill. Now, under these circumstances, it is laid before this body, who have had no opportunity to examine it such as they desire, with the business before the Senate; and yet we are called upon to take it up on one day instead of another, the day after it is reported to the Senate, when the information called for has not been obtained.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to explain? I certainly did not understand that the committee had agreed that the bill should be postponed until the Senator obtained his information. If I had, I should have made no such motion as I have made to-day; but the Senator proposed that the committee should inquire, and I suggested that he had better make his inquiry through the Senate. He made it on one day, and the bill was not reported until the day after. This is now the second day since the call was made. I gave notice yesterday that I should call up the bill to-day. I certainly would not, on any such understanding, have made a proposition to take it up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not intimate at all—and I hope the chairman will not so suppose—that he violates any agreement or understanding. I referred simply to what he said, and what was my understanding. I stated in the committee, if he will allow me to refer to the conversation there, and if it is not proper I will not refer to it at all—I make no charge upon him, but it is simply in reference to myself—that I desired to obtain this information before the bill was reported, for the reason, as I stated, that I thought I should wish to propose certain amendments to the bill which I could not propose until I obtained the information. It was then suggested that the bill might be reported, that I might call for my information in the Senate, have it here, and then prepare my amendments, and do what I desired. Well, what is the result? The bill came in. Simultaneously upon its report I put in my call for information. That call has not been answered. I have not been able to come to any conclusion in my own mind as to whether I shall propose the amendments or what they shall be.

Now, I will say to my honorable friend from Arkansas, that with regard to the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance, I regard them as very unimportant parts of the bill. The great question to be considered is upon the Army appropriations, the principles upon which the Army appropriations are founded, and the amount that is demanded by the Administration. There is a contest upon them. The others are very small matters; you may dispose of them in a very short time, and you will not affect the main question. The information I desire, and the consideration which I shall attempt to give to this bill after I get the information, goes to the root of the matter in dispute. Although I am disposed to treat the Government fairly, I hope, and to treat this question fairly—not to indulge in denunciations unless those denunciations are deserved, and I shall think them of some importance—yet I do not wish to be called upon when I have objected to this course, and when I have demanded this information in order to enlighten me upon the question, to be forced into a consideration of this bill. Nor do I wish other gentlemen who have not had the tenth part of the opportunity I have had to look into the bill to be forced into its consideration without having the reasonable time that we ought to have. I do not know that I shall oppose the bill at all; I cannot say that I shall; but I wish to have time to look and see what the real facts are in relation to it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, this bill is evidently a very urgent one. Its immediate passage is required by the necessities of the Government. The Senator from Virginia is pressing its consideration to-day. We all appreciate his motives in so doing; but I would suggest to him, under the circumstances, whether, if by common consent we were to make it the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday, we should not get along as fast as by pressing it to-day. That will give gentlemen an opportunity of looking at the bill between to-day and Monday, and then we can go on with it on Monday morning.

Mr. HUNTER. If we can have an understanding that we shall take it up, by general consent, at half past twelve o'clock on Monday, I shall not object to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to that if we can have the information to-day, so that we shall have time to look into it.

Mr. HALE. I shall propose, when the bill comes up, an amendment, which, though brief, is a very important one, and goes to the root of the whole thing; and, by common consent, I should like to have it introduced and printed, so that it may be before the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. With the understanding suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, I shall not object to the postponement.

Mr. KING. This information will be here to-day?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; the understanding is that it shall.

The Clerk read Mr. HALE's proposed amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by any officer or agent of the Government, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to move to take up the bill for the purpose of moving that it be made the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask general consent to submit that motion.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that it be made the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday.

Mr. PUGH. Before that question is taken, I think it is necessary for me to make some answer to the assault of the Senator from Maine, which was wholly unnecessary, and, I suppose, meant for his own personal justification. I pretended to no information, except from reading the bill. I say the bill does not purport to carry out any contract; and therefore anything that relates to a contract made or to be made is not germane to the question of taking up the bill. As to the rest of it, my statement was, that this bill had been printed by order of the Senate; for I asked the Senator from Virginia to have it printed when it was read the second time, in order that I might read it. I do not pretend to learn faster than the Committee on Finance, but I do not think it would take even the Senator from Maine three days to tell us what he knows about it; and if he was three days in finding it out, I thought he might proceed to tell us; and if we came to any point of difficulty, then the bill might go over. I have no doubt, from what I have heard from the Senator from Illinois and others, that it will be debated two or three days; and I can see no object in the language of the Senator from Maine, except to cover his own retreat by a false attack.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow the vote to be taken on my motion to postpone, and then have his amendment printed?

Mr. HALE. I shall not occupy time, but I desire simply to state a fact, so that the Senate may see what I intend by the amendment. By the sixth section of the act of May 1, 1820, all contracts on behalf of the Government are forbidden, unless under a law or an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except for the quartermaster's department, and I propose to repeal that exception. That is the gist of my amendment.

The motion to make the bill the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move that my amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

A MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. F. CARTER, its Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 203), for the relief of George W. Biscoe;

A bill (H. R. No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mc. McIntosh of the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 488) for the relief of Cassius M. Clay; and

A bill (H. R. No. 489) for the relief of congressional township numbered twenty-seven north, of range numbered six east, in Wabash county, in the State of Indiana.

Also that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore:

An act to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless; and

An act for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated:

A bill (No. 488) for the relief of Cassius M. Clay—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mc. McIntosh, of the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (No. 203) for the relief of George W. Biscoe—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (No. 489) for the relief of congressional township numbered twenty-seven north, of range numbered six east, in Wabash county, in the State of Indiana—to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMMANDER THOMAS J. PAGE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I requested a motion to be entered yesterday to reconsider the bill that was passed in favor of Thomas Jefferson Page, of the United States Navy. My reason was the want of correspondence between the statement of that officer and what I believed to be the facts of the case. Whether that officer is to blame, or whether he has misapprehended the facts in his statement, or whether the Department was culpable and delinquent in its duty, I do not know. I see in the statement of the officer, that he says:

"He was not even allowed a clerk by the Department. The extent of country to be explored, both by land and water, necessarily involved, at various times, not only a separation of portions of the officers and 'ship's company' from the vessel, but also made it necessary that the petitioner himself should be absent for periods of from one to six months. It will be perceived that, had he remained on board to attend in person to the duties of purser, he could not have properly discharged, under his instructions, the more important duties of the expedition, and that, in obeying his instructions, he was necessarily compelled to intrust to others not only the command of the vessel, but the discharge of the purser's duties also."

Now, Mr. President, if the Department sent him out unprepared, the Secretary of the Navy was to blame for that. If, however, he had all the necessary appliances and conveniences that are usual on such occasions, he has failed in the discharge of his duty. It is to be presumed that an officer who is placed in command of a vessel at sea, is not only familiar with his own duty, but with all the duties subordinate to his own, so that he may be enabled to execute the purposes of the Government understandingly. If he is not acquainted with all the duties subordinate to his own, he is incapable of the duties of a commanding officer; and for this reason I insist that either the officer himself is to blame in his statement, or that the Department failed in discharging its duty.

He says he had no clerk. Now, sir, I have informed myself on that subject; and I have a statement from the Department that he had a clerk—for whom $500 was paid—and it was upon his voucher that this clerk was paid. Therefore, his assertion that he had no clerk, and the letter of the Department showing that a clerk has been paid, seem to be in conflict.

It is not unusual, but customary, under the circumstances under which he sailed in the service upon which he was detailed, that the commanding officer of the vessel shall act as purser; because the duties are not sufficient to require a purser to be sent from vessels of superior character and size. He says furthermore:

"The losses incurred, and for which he is held responsible, arise from payment made to sailors who deserted from the vessel in debt to the Government."

Sir, he had no right to let the sailors contract a debt of one cent. He was bound to see that they did not overgo their pay, and that they only received pay for services rendered, and after the services had been rendered. Instead of that, we find that they were paid in advance by the purser's steward. He had his clerk to supervise the action of the purser's steward, and he must have been in communication with his clerk; so that this remissness in attending to the duties of purser either grew out of his own neglect or the villainy of men on whom he relied; and he must have selected the individuals for the discharge of these subordinate duties and therefore he is responsible for their acts under him.

Mr. GWIN. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but the hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is a privileged motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to reconsider is a privileged question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall make a speech against the Senator's railroad project when it comes up; but it is not in order now.

Mr. GWIN. We expect him to do that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will do it. The statement of Mr. Page further says:

"The money for which he is held responsible was not spent contrary to law, but through ignorance, in part, of regulations with which he could not have been supposed to be familiar, inasmuch as they did not relate to his duties proper, and he knew nothing of their existence, and, in part, through errors of the steward, in whom, as above stated, he was necessarily obliged to confide much in the calculation of accounts," &c.

Where was his clerk? He was there, for he was paid; the Department certifies that he was paid. This is one of the officers who were retained by the retiring board as competent morally, physically, professionally, and in every other way. If he was, I insist that he was accountable for the performance of the duties of every officer under his command; and it is no plea that there was remissness, or neglect, or malfeasance, in a subordinate, or that he was not familiar with their duties, for it is presumed, and it is a matter of fact, that every accomplished officer is familiar with all the duties subordinate to his station. No officer would possess power and accomplishments with the rank of captain in the Army if he was not also acquainted familiarly, so far as the required intelligence would go, with all the duties connected with a general's station. He is not professionally qualified for the discharge of the duties of an officer of his rank unless he is familiar with all that are subordinate to his station. He must have gone from midshipman to passed midshipman, to lieutenant, and to commander; and he must know what the duties of a purser are; he must know the duties of a clerk; he must be able to determine the difference between a purser's steward and the clerk of a vessel. It is presumed that the Department had prepared him, as is customary on such occasions, and afforded him all the facilities that were required for the execution of the orders and commands with which he was intrusted. For the reasons I have stated, I move that the vote passing the bill for his relief be reconsidered.

Mr. MASON. There were two small bills which passed at my instance a day or two since, one of which authorizes the payment of the sum of $75 to Commander Page, for the actual expenses incurred by him, he not being an accountant, in stating the accounts of the purser's department before the Department on a cruise of three years and five months, chiefly in the La Plata river. The other is to authorize the accounting officers to allow him a credit or credits amounting altogether to $334 46, for charges in the purser's account of the ship, which, according to the rules of the Department, seem not to have been legitimate charges on the part of the purser. It is stated in the report which was made by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as the report of the committee, that in their judgment, these allowances ought to be made, for the reasons stated by them.

Now, the reasons stated in the report are not that Commander Page was ignorant of the duties of a purser, but that, when this gentleman was commanding that ship, from the necessary duties of his position—for he was on an exploring expedition—it was utterly impossible for him to give a personal superintendence to that subject. I do not know whether he is familiar with the duties of a purser or not. I should think he would be a very extraordinary man if he were; because the duties of a purser are pretty much, in the detail, those of the keeper of a shop, who is required by the United States to issue from his storehouse minute articles of clothing, the minutest articles of dress, at stated prices, to the crew, and charge them accordingly; as well as to pay them their wages, fix what they are to have, how it is to be charged, and what the prices are. These are matters of minute arrangement from the naval regulations, as I understand. I doubt not that, if this gentleman could have remained on board his vessel, and given his personal superintendence to the duties of purser, substituting himself in place of a purser, these inaccuracies and errors would not have occurred; but I equally well know that, if he had done so, he would have disappointed the great object of his cruise, and he would have shown himself unworthy of the far higher trust which was reposed in him, and which he has so well discharged, in conducting the expedition to the La Plata.

The honorable Senator from Texas objects that Captain Page was allowed a clerk. Although it is stated in the report of the committee that he was not, the Senator presents a statement made by A. O. Dayton, who, I believe, is the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, that Commander Page "had a clerk, who was paid at the rate of $500 per annum." There would, therefore, seem to be a discrepancy between the statement in the report and the statement of Mr. Dayton. I have not seen Mr. Page since this bill was passed, or since this objection was made; but I know, in the first place, as I dare say many Senators know, that Mr. Page is not only an officer of high position, but that he is a gentleman of undoubted honor and truth. Whatever he states I know is the truth; and I take it there is really no conflict of veracity between him and the accounting officer. I should construe the statement in the report to mean this, that he was not allowed a clerk by the Department to act in the place of a purser. I believe it is usual to allow the captains of ships to have a captain's clerk. I presume he means he was not allowed a clerk to act in the place of purser; because we find, in another part of the report, it is said that these errors were committed by the purser's steward, on whom it would appear that the active duties of a purser were necessarily devolved.

I know, from conversation with naval officers very often, that when they are put in command of small vessels, they are not allowed a purser by the usage of the service. They are themselves not pursers; the duties of a purser are minute, involving a great deal of detail, a great deal of careful supervision in the management of the stores; and I know that these gentlemen frequently sustain loss, either from inaccuracies or infidelity on the part of the subordinates of the ship, on whom they are obliged to devolve these duties. I have thought it was a hardship in the service that duties should devolve on them, involving responsibilities which are not properly a part of the naval duties of their station. But be that as it may, in this instance, this officer was in command of the steamer Water Witch, for the exploration and survey of the river La Plata and its tributaries. I have looked into his report, which has been made and printed by the Senate—not now, but some time since—and I have found, as he states, that the duties of survey and exploration frequently took him from his vessel, and sent him on long journeys inland on the tributaries, and he was absent for five or six months at a time in the discharge of the duties confided to him on that exploration. During that time, he left not only the command of the ship, but all the duties of purser, of necessity, in charge of a subordinate, the purser's steward, and some of these inaccuracies, it seems, resulted from mere computation of figures.

I will not detain the Senate, but say only that these inaccuracies are certified in the report from the Naval Committee to have been inaccuracies and errors only, involving no default whatever; for it is stated that all the money that is charged here was actually paid, and the vouchers only disallowed because they were not according to the regulations of the service, inaccuracies resulting, as the report also states, not from infidelity, but from ignorance and incapacity of the purser's steward, on whom these duties devolved, the responsibility, however, being on the commanding officer. The whole is little over four hundred dollars. One bill is for $75, and the other for $354. I hope they will not be reconsidered.

Mr. HOUSTON. My friend from Virginia, I think, misapprehends the true state of the case. The petitioner says that a large portion, perhaps all, the money was paid to men in advance; that is, they were furnished and credited with their articles in advance. This was contrary to the regulations, and after having obtained this credit they deserted, leaving the Government deficient. That was no discharge of the duties. Any clerk, or any steward, would know very well that he was bound by the regulations not to advance anything to sailors, but that he was to pay them up to the time they served. Their payments are regular; their issues are regular; the receipts taken from them should be regular; and it is nothing to discharge the duty of purser. It is a very small thing to take memoranda from the men of what is paid; and no difficulty can arise if the least care is exercised. As this officer was furnished with the ordinary means given to officers placed in similar circumstances, if you set this precedent it will require the eternal action of this body to make up the deficiencies that officers will render to the Government for want of the proper vouchers, and the time of Congress will be used as accounting officers to the Government in making up for deficiencies, and misapplication of the means of the Government, by granting relief to individuals. I am for holding to a strict accountability men who are intrusted with public funds; and if they are not careful in obtaining the requisite vouchers, let them be responsible to the Government, and be docked in their pay or perquisites. It used to be so, and it ought to be so again.

The motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill was rejected.

INDIANA MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Mr. STUART. I suppose the unfinished business of yesterday is first in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana yearly meeting of the Society of Friends being the unfinished business, is before the Senate. That takes precedence of the special order.

Mr. CLAY. I do not see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Johnson] in his seat. He desired to say something on this bill; and as he is a member of the committee who reported it, and is opposed to it, I think the question ought not to be taken in his absence. He requested me—

Mr. STUART. The Senator is here, I think; he has been here all the morning. I presume he is about the building, and will be in before the bill is disposed of. I certainly would not take any advantage of his absence; but we adjourned on this bill yesterday.

Mr. GWIN. I move to postpone this bill, in order to proceed to the consideration of the special order. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. STUART. I think it had better be disposed of.

Mr. GWIN. But a Senator who wishes to discuss it is not here. I am in favor of the bill, and will agree to take it up in the morning hour at any time.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The motion of Mr. Gwin was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE to strike out of the amendment of Mr. POLK the words "or in the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, or of the State of Arkansas, between the mouth of the Big Sioux river and," and insert "between Breckinridge, at the confluence of the Bois des Sioux with the Red river of the North, on the western boundary of Minnesota."

Mr. POLK. With the consent of the Senate, I should like to correct an error which I find I fell into, on the day before yesterday, in the course of the remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate on the Pacific railroad bill. I stated that the distance on the route surveyed on or near the thirty-fifth parallel by Lieutenant Whipple—the Whipple route I will call it—from Fort Smith to the crossing on the Colorado, is one thousand three hundred and ninety-five miles, and from the same point to the east bank of the Rio Grande is one thousand one hundred and thirty-five miles, making a distance of only two hundred and sixty miles between the Rio Grande and the Rio Colorado.

I ought to have said that "the distance from the same point on the east bank of the Rio Grande is eight hundred and fifty miles, leaving a distance of only five hundred and forty-five miles between the Rio Grande and Rio Colorado."

I said, also, that starting from the mouth of the Kansas it would be necessary, in order to get on the thirty-fifth parallel, to make a southing of three hundred and fifty miles, being ninety miles more than the entire distance between the Rio Grande and the Colorado. Instead of "ninety miles more," I ought to have said "one hundred and ninety-five miles less." I further said that, in order to get from the mouth of the Big Sioux to the same parallel, it would be necessary to make a southing of five hundred and twenty miles, being exactly twice as great as the distance between these two rivers on the Whipple route. Instead of "exactly twice as great as the difference," I ought to have said "twenty-five miles less than the distance."

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] to a statement which he made in his speech in relation to an amendment I had the honor to propose to the Pacific railroad bill, and to ask him to correct it. He certainly has done me very great injustice. I will call the attention of the Senator to that portion of his speech. He said:

"The bill has been before us frequently before—not this particular bill, but this measure—and in various shapes. According to my recollection, when it was first introduced by an honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk], who, all here regret, is no longer with us, it was, as the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Iverson] proposes, upon a direct authority to the President to make a contract for the construction of the road."

Now, sir, my proposition is no such thing. The Senator certainly misunderstood it, or did not hear it. My proposition is not to authorize the President to make a contract for the construction of a road. It does not differ in that respect from the bill of the Senator from California. It authorizes the President to make a contract for the transportation of the mails and public property over the road, and to advance so much upon that contract; nothing more. My whole speech was against the power of the Government to construct the road itself, and against the policy and expediency of it. The Senator did not understand my proposition.

Mr. MASON. I doubt not the Senator has accurately stated his own position. The misapprehensions under which I was at the time I made those remarks to the Senate, were derived either from a careless reading of the amendment the Senator had offered, or a misconstruction of what he said. My impression was that he proposed to give power to the President to construct the road. I very willingly, and with much pleasure, make the correction.

Mr. BRODERICK. I rise for the purpose of correcting a remark that fell from me on Thursday week last, when the railroad question was before the Senate. I said:

"I am satisfied that the emigrant route from Independence to Carson valley, which strikes the border of California, will be selected by the contractors, if it is left to them to decide."

I intended to have said, "from Independence to Noble's Pass or Carson valley." I make the correction now for the purpose of having it set right.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything in relation to the pending amendment specially, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the condition of this bill. Here is a bill that has been reported to us by a special committee, and I really do not know, so far, how many amendments we have had to the first section. I think that anybody who has listened to the debates in the Senate must have become satisfied that it is impossible to procure a majority of this body to agree upon any one scheme at the present time. The bill now before you, sir, proposes, as the labor of this special committee, to limit the point at which the terminus of this road is to be established, on the eastern side, to the Missouri river, between the mouths of the Big Sioux and the Kansas rivers. The committee have, therefore, so far as lies in their power, selected a route for this road. I do not say they have done so in entire disregard of the surveys which have been made, or in entire disregard of the cost and length of such a road; but it is obvious that it cannot be expected that gentlemen here from the South can join in the passage of a bill which deprives them of the benefit of this great enterprise. If this bill is to be passed on the ground that the General Government has the right to give assistance to any communication of this kind with a view to facilitate military operations, let the bill be put upon the basis of a military road, and then the object being solely to provide a speedy and safe communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, let that communication be put upon such line as the contractors will agree to build it on for the least money, and in the shortest time; but let us not, under the pretext of exercising the war power of the Government, provide a commercial road.

Again, sir, let us not, under the pretext of providing for the transportation of the mail or military stores, build a railroad in States of the Union. If the road is to be built by the Government, let the bill state what it is; let it not evade or shirk the question; let it profess to be a bill for building a railroad to the Pacific ocean at the cost of the General Government, and let the people understand for what their money is voted.

I throw out these general considerations, not having any desire to enter into a special discussion of the bill, because it must be obvious to all that we cannot agree upon any bill for this purpose now, that we are wasting our time, that we have had the matter under consideration for weeks, and have not made one step of progress in it, and we shall make none. In the present condition of the public Treasury, with a loan already authorized, at the present session, of $20,000,000, with another loan of thirty or forty million dollars staring us in the face; with deficiency bills of six or eight millions coming in upon us almost every day, I was going to say, but I do not wish to exaggerate; with a war that is called the Utah war upon our hands; with fresh regiments of volunteers raised; with other expenses which we can all anticipate within the course of the present year; with a diminished importation, with no resources for the Treasury but those duties which are falling off in amount every day, does anybody believe that the Congress of the United States is going, at the present session, to inaugurate an enterprise that at its very outset is to involve an expenditure of $25,000,000? That is what the bill proposes. We all know that it will be fourfold that amount. Gentlemen do not anticipate the passage of this bill. I cannot do so much injustice to their statesmanship, their sagacity, as to believe that they for a moment expect any such bill as this to pass. We are wasting our time, sir; we have but six weeks of the session left; and in order to bring this matter to the test, I now make a motion, which I hope will be considered a test motion, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until December next; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I am not disposed to answer the Senator from Louisiana. He states with great positiveness that there is not a member of this body who thinks we are going to pass this bill. Why, sir, he is very much mistaken in regard to a great many members. He also brings up the bankrupt condition of the Treasury, and says we are going to pass a bill to take $25,000,000 out of the national Treasury. I leave it to the Senate to say whether he makes a correct statement of the bill. It is well known that if the bill passes in its present form, it will be at least one, and probably two years, before a dollar of the bonds provided for will be issued. Then it is not drawing money out of the Treasury, but it is simply creating an evidence of debt to be repaid by service, and as fast as the bonds are issued the transportation provided for in the bill will repay the Government the interest which they will have to pay on these bonds. They do not contract one dollar of debt.

But, Mr. President, this is a broad proposition of the Senator. I shall take this vote as a test vote. If the motion prevails, I shall understand that this Congress does not intend to pass any kind of a bill to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific by a railroad for military or other purposes. I shall take this as an indication that, notwithstanding the evidences of public sentiment we have had from all sections of the country, notwithstanding the evidence we had of public sentiment in the great contest of 1856, when all parties were in favor of this measure, they have forgotten their pledges and their duties to their constituents, and intend to defeat this or any other bill of a similar kind.

Mr. STUART. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California, for I really do not rise to debate this question now, whether inasmuch as this motion is offered by the Senator from Louisiana as a test motion, he would not consider it better to postpone the bill until Monday when the Senate will be full.

Mr. GWIN. I think it can be voted down easily now. I hope so. I believe that the Senate is as full as usual.

Mr. STUART. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I suppose it will be in order after this vote is taken, if it is determined not to postpone the bill, to offer amendments in regard to the termini and route of the proposed road. ["Oh, yes."] But the proposition now before us is to postpone the bill. I am sure, sir, that during the whole consideration of this subject the South has observed a course of as much forbearance as the representatives of any people could possibly have observed where they have interests so deeply involved and where evidently there are so many features of the subject-matter itself decidedly in their favor and on which they must feel so warmly. But is it not apparent that in the consideration of the project now before us, there has been no other object than to give a sectional direction; I believe so; it seems so to me; and with all the advantages of climate, of graduation, of favorable route from this side to the Pacific, superior to any other in cheapness and shortness, the interests of the South are evidently to be disregarded. Such being the case, I shall vote to postpone this bill. That is one consideration influencing me to favor the postponement.

Another consideration is my belief that within the few weeks of the session now remaining, no determination of this matter can be had. My own State is deeply interested in it. I have sat patiently here and waited to see whether the advantages of two of the southern routes would be considered, or any weight given to them whatever. I have seen no evidence of anything of the kind. Missouri seems to be the only party that approaches to a southern State at all, that is making any contest. I do not see that Texas has said anything as yet, or taken any ground, or that Louisiana has much interest herself in the matter; I know that my own State has not; and it seems to me that, in despite of snows and of mountains of almost insurmountable obstacles, the intention and will seem to be to drive a road across a northern route at any expense to the national Treasury to which we contribute equally, and yet we are to be excluded from any fair opportunity to participate in it. We cease almost to be considered as a part of this Union. We cease almost to be considered as parties having rights. Nature itself declares in our favor, but her voice is disregarded. The explorations that have been made and published show the advantages of the southern routes in such a light that I think they are the only routes on which capitalists can be induced to embark their means in the construction of a road; but still they cannot be considered.

This Government was made for the common protection of all parts of this Union. Now, however, a road cannot be started unless it is to benefit one section to the injury of another. It takes that coloring. I have not pressed the rights or claims of my own State to any consideration in this matter; and up to this hour, I have not said a solitary word in regard to the subject; but I know that there are two routes, one on the thirty-fifth parallel, and the El Paso route, that materially affect the interests of my own people; and these two routes, I am well aware, are by far the cheapest that can be taken by the Government of the United States: If we confine ourselves to the construction of a road beyond the limits of State jurisdiction, there are not five hundred miles to be constructed on the El Paso route, and there are no very serious natural obstacles in the way. There does not seem to be an inclination in the northern side of the House to consider it at all. Then, if you are not willing to go to that point, there is the route on the thirty-fifth parallel. That, too, is scarcely considered. I never hear a gentleman from the northern section of the Union make any allusion to it at all. On the contrary, they talk to us of the route through what is called the South Pass; and I believe it is the best of all the northern routes, from what examination I have been able to make; but it will carry us to the Columbia river and the Territory of Oregon, and will not reach California except by a deflection of many hundred miles.

The differences are so wide and so great, and the spirit of sectionalism is so strong, that I can have no hope that, in the short period now remaining of this session of Congress, it will be possible for us to determine the subject; and therefore, I shall certainly, under the circumstances, feel bound to cast my vote for postponing indefinitely the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was my intention, Mr. President, at some period of this debate, to introduce amendments, and to offer some remarks upon them; but, believing as I do, from the character of the business before the Senate, and the limited duration of the session, that, in all probability, the bill will be postponed, I think fit here to give notice of a proposition which I intended to introduce in the nature of an amendment. It is in relation to the eastern terminus of the road, connecting the Mississippi with San Diego and San Francisco. It is "that the eastern terminus shall be opposite Memphis, in Arkansas, or the mouth of the Red river, in Louisiana. This terminus would give to the whole community benefits which can flow from no other location. It communicates directly with the Mississippi at a point where it is navigable at all times. The points indicated by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as well as the other amendments, are subject to obstruction in navigation. At the points designated by me, navigation can at no time be interfered with. The distances are less; the results are greater than can be derived from any of the other routes.

Gentleman say it is the duty of patriotism to open this communication by the most direct and immediate means, and they appeal to us for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this road. If that is really the object, we ought to disregard localities, we ought to disregard sections, we ought to lay our hands to the work in good earnest, and for the purpose of accomplishing a national object—an object that will redound beneficially not only to California, but to the States of the Atlantic. This can only be done by taking that route which is the most facile, and at the same time most convenient, where the appliances necessary to the accomplishment of the object can be most immediately commanded. That is the route by El Paso, the terminus of which I have indicated. Neither of the points I have suggested as the eastern terminus directly affects the State in which I am. Neither of them is within the limits of the State of which I am a citizen.

But, sir, when you strike the Mississippi at the points I have suggested, the whole Atlantic ocean is open to you. You communicate with the southern roads to Charleston, and other ports, so that the whole South is accommodated. You also have direct communication with Cairo, at the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi. In the winter season, when the navigation beyond the mouth of the Ohio, up the Mississippi and Ohio is obstructed, railroad facilities begin at that point, so that the North is not excluded. If, however, you begin at any point on the Mississippi river above St. Louis, or above the junction of the Mississippi and the Ohio, you completely lock up this commerce to the South; they have no intercourse with that section of the country by any direct means, whereas that section would have all the advantages that could result to an ice-locked country, as it is at seasons.

I insist strenuously on the superior advantages of the southern route. It passes through fertile regions, where the soil is rich, the facilities for the work great, timber sufficient, until you reach the El Paso; and on this route emigration will keep pace with, and even anticipate the progress of the road, so soon as the line is marked out. Then you will have way travel; you will have all the conveniences necessary for the construction of the road. The supplies necessary for the subsistence of the hands engaged in it will all be supplied on this route. Not only that; but it is well ascertained that after leaving El Paso, by a short divergence through Arizona to San Diego, you can very soon have all necessary supplies, for emigration will soon produce them. Agriculture is prosperous in some sections through which that route would pass.

But, if you make the road through a sterile, wilderness region far north, you will never return to the Treasury the $25,000,000 proposed to be expended; and I should like to know from the Senator from California if it would not be taking $25,000,000 from the Treasury, without the prospect of being reimbursed for ages? He says it is to be returned by the conveyance of the mails. How long will it take to construct a railway for the conveyance of the mails to California—a length of some nineteen hundred miles, I believe, on the northern routes? When you complete one hundred miles, are you to take the mail there, and leave it to be carried as best it may the residue of the distance, through the mountains, impassable for conveyance, and where it will take months to accomplish it? What would be the use of sending a mail there, when, by the isthmus transit-route, it would reach California much more readily? You are to use the cars to transport the mail to an impassable wilderness, and there you are to leave it, and you are to pay $250 a mile for that. You are to take it from the settlements of Missouri into the wilderness, and there it must stop, until you have accomplished the largest portion of the road, where the mail cannot be transported in the same time it now is from San Antonio, in Texas, to San Diego, in California, in coaches. Twenty-one days now is all the time that is required for the accomplishment of that trip. There is demonstration conclusive that nature has established conveniences on that route; so that, with comparatively little aid from this Government, if you really desire on this great occasion to accomplish all that is necessary and desirable in connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific possessions of the United States, it can be accomplished.

Mr. President, I contend that the construction of a railway to the Pacific is a great national measure, and I will advocate it strenuously. Whenever you divest it of all appearance of sectionalism, and of selfishness, and make it purely a national measure, I will go heart and hand for it. I will submit to heavier taxation for it than for any imaginable purpose that I can conceive of. But I am not going to foster it, as a measure either for sectional or speculative purposes. I must have it as a great national measure. I believe we have the constitutional power to do it. I will only ask my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] who doubts the constitutional power to construct a road of this character, by what constitutional authority have we gained possession of California? Is the acquisition of territory incidental to a government? If it is, it is incidental to a government that it shall have power to preserve and defend that territory. When he answers my question I shall be prepared to answer his. It is a measure that we must look in the face. It is one of vital importance, and we must all lay our hands to it as a great and mighty work of national interest and concernment, divested of everything sectional or local in its character. If its accomplishment is to be secured, it must be done with united hands and united hearts, with reference alone to the public good and its accomplishment on the most reasonable terms that the national resources will justify.

Mr. BRODERICK. It may be that I may not have another opportunity to say anything on the bill, if I do not take the present occasion. I am not surprised at the motion made by the Senator from Louisiana, because it has been evident to me ever since this bill came up for consideration in the Senate, that a large majority of the Senators representing the southern States were entirely opposed to the bill introduced by my colleague. But I would inform the Senator from Louisiana, and the other southern Senators upon this floor, that the vote of California was given to Mr. Buchanan on this question. If it had not been for a letter sent by him to the chairman of the Democratic central committee of California, about three weeks previous to the election, I believe that Mr. Fillmore would have carried the State, instead of Mr. Buchanan. Now, sir, the people of California have been humbugged; for in the President's first message we found out that he favored the extreme southern route; and you might as well undertake to build a railroad to the moon, for the fact is that it will cost more to construct a road from where that route strikes California to San Francisco, than it would cost twice over to connect Texas with California. Therefore the road of which the Senator from Texas speaks would be of no earthly use to California.

Mr. HOUSTON. Texas is constructing eight hundred miles of the road; and from San Diego to Fulton, on the Red river, is only one thousand six hundred and eighteen miles.

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir; but it is over a barren territory where no one lives.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is the most fertile country on the face of the earth.

Mr. BRODERICK. Well, sir, if it is fertile, no one has been able to discover it; for I believe there are very few people residing in that part of the territory. I hope that the vote will be taken to-day. If there is a majority of the Senate in favor of the bill introduced by my colleague, let it be ascertained. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate further on this subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate either. It is rather accidental that I made any remarks, supposing that another occasion would be offered when my remarks would be more germane, and I should have been better prepared for a clear exposition of the subject. But, sir, the gentleman calls a region of country which I say is one of the most fertile and desirable, a desert waste. For eight hundred miles in Texas, this route from Fulton, on the Red river, to the Rio Grande, runs through a beautiful country.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator will allow me to explain. I did not speak of Texas; I know nothing about the soil of Texas; I spoke of the territory between Texas and California.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have never been in that country, and if it is as barren as reported, I cannot say that I would fancy to be there; but very often these matters are exaggerated. It happens, however, that other people get there. It was once a beautifully cultivated and inhabited country; so desirable was it, and so poorly was protection furnished to the inhabitants by the Mexican Government, that the possessors of it, a harmless, agricultural, and pastoral people, were expelled by the hostile bands of Indians after the Mexican revolution began in 1812. Large ranches, the ruins of splendid churches, are all there to bear testimony to the very desirable character of that country. Inhabitants are now falling into portions of it, converting it again into a useful and cultivated region. So soon as it is opened to the inhabitants of the United States, so enterprising in their character, we may expect to see it resume its former activity, its former wealth and abundance.

It has been demonstrated that it is necessary to have way travel to support a railroad; and I say this is the only section of the Union through which you can construct a Pacific railroad where you ever will have way passengers to sustain the line. It is folly to talk of having way travel on a route through mountainous regions where the Indian walks with trepidation for fear of starving for want of game. This is a beautiful region, and by making a short circuit you will always be within cultivable land; and though you may, by going in a direct line, have a sandy desert to pass for some distance, people traverse that desert; and the appliances that would be made of genius, of art, and of enterprise, would soon overcome an obstacle of that kind, and make a communication direct with California.

Sir, is it an impassable region? Could the mail be transported in twenty-one days from San Antonio to San Diego, in California, if it were? There is a practicable refutation to the slanders upon the southern route. It is the only one that nature has stamped with feasibility, or that we can ascertain to be practicable. There is an affirmation that none can deny. It takes twenty-one days from San Antonio, in Texas, which is ninety miles from our sea-board on the Gulf of Mexico. From San Antonio it traverses that region with animals and transports the mail and passengers in twenty-one days, obtaining all the necessary conveniences for effecting an enterprise of the kind. Where have you such a demonstration in favor of any other route? There is none other feasible, there is none other practicable, and you may talk about it as much as you please, whenever California is connected with the Atlantic States, the El Paso route is the one by which it will be done.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am very glad, sir, that the distinguished Senator from Texas has made his last speech, because I am now satisfied that he will vote for the bill of my colleague. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the route of which he speaks from being selected, if it is the best, if it is the shortest, and if on it a road can be built for less money than on any other route. If that be so, and the contractors are willing to construct it on the thirty-second parallel of latitude, that route will be chosen. But, sir, no man on this floor who knows anything about the State of California will say that such a road would be of any benefit to her. It touches the extreme southern end of the State, and three fourths of the population of California reside north of San Francisco. I believe the distance would be eight or nine hundred miles from where it would strike California to San Francisco. My objection to that route is that my State would derive no benefit from it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not know that San Francisco was California before. I admit that it is a great city, a great place, and that there are clever people there; but I did not know it was the State. I thought the policy was to form a connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific by which California would be benefited. San Diego is very near California. I thought it was a part of California.

Mr. BRODERICK. There are not one hundred and fifty inhabitants in the town.

Mr. HOUSTON. No matter. It opens communication. If the gold of California, and the enterprise of its citizens, with their numerous population, will not justify their making railroads, it is not our fault, if we give them an opportunity by making a trunk line, to run branches all over the State. There is no impediment interposed to their enterprise by this course; and it is a course that ought to be taken without reference to towns, cities, or anything else. All we have to watch is the hills, streams, and deserts. We have to avoid them, but not the towns.

Mr. IVERSON. I have been, and I am yet, willing to provide for the construction of a road from the Atlantic States to the Pacific ocean, and to bring to that great enterprise the aid of the Government, as far as is proper, and within the limits of the Constitution and its pecuniary ability. I believe it is proper and constitutional, as I stated in my argument the other day, to grant alternate sections of public lands; I have no difficulty about that constitutional question; I believe that it is the proper policy of the Government to grant alternate sections of public lands to aid in the construction of railroads, no matter where they are located, because my opinion is that the interest of the public Treasury is advanced by it. We get more money, or at least we get as much money, and get it sooner, by that policy, than we should get if the railroads are not constructed by our aid.

I have no difficulty in regard to the constitutional power to make a contract for a grant of money to parties for carrying the mails over a road which they may construct. I think we may constitutionally make such a contract. Such contracts are made every day with the Government. It is a matter of necessity, as well as of policy and propriety.

Then, as to the expediency of doing this, what is the proposition in this bill? It is to enter into a contract with the company who shall agree to construct this road to carry the mails for a term of years—I think for twenty years after the completion of the road, allowing ten years for its construction, which would then be a period of thirty years, to which the contract should extend—for so much per mile per annum, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $25,000,000. Let us see what will be the operation of that provision. At present the Government is paying for the transportation of the United States mails, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, $1,300,000 a year. That is the present expense, I understand. It gives $700,000 to the companies who carry the mail by way of Panama, and $600,000 to the overland mail company for carrying it twice a month.

Mr. GWIN. Besides, there are $150,000 paid for carrying it from San Antonio to San Diego, and $300,000 by way of Salt Lake.

Mr. IVERSON. I was not aware of these additional amounts. They would swell the sum to more than a million and a half of dollars per annum. This bill proposes to advance proportionate sums to the extent of $25,000,000, for a service of thirty years. Under the present system before that term of thirty years expires, the Government will have expended for the transportation of the mails alone, more than $50,000,000. To say nothing of items suggested by the Senator from California, the $1,300,000 now paid would amount in thirty years to $39,000,000, and for thirty years we propose to make this contract under the bill. Which is the most economical to the Government; which is the worst, which is the best? I leave Senators and the country to decide that question.

I have therefore been, and still am, in favor of providing for this work, by the advancement of governmental aid. I did, in the commencement of this investigation by the select committee, propose a compromise route, which I thought ought to have been acceptable, as well to northern as to southern members of Congress. I proposed to commence the road at any point between the mouth of the Big Sioux, on the Missouri river, and the mouth of the Kansas river, thence to run down in a southwestern direction, to cross the Rio Grande at any point which might be most acceptable below Santa Fe—Santa Fe is twenty or thirty miles, I think, above Albuquerque—and thence on the most feasible route to San Francisco, or any other point on the Pacific which the contractors might deem it proper to select. This was my proposition. If it had been accepted, and the road constructed, it would have given an easy, a natural, and feasible connection with all the northern railroads. The mouth of the Big Sioux is on the same parallel with Chicago. There would have been an easy connection with the roads that terminate at Chicago; an easy connection with the roads in Minnesota and Iowa, and in all the other northwestern States. By the direction of the road, it would also be brought within the competency of St. Louis and that interest, to connect with it without a very great expense. Coming down and crossing the Rio Grande at Albuquerque, or some other point in that neighborhood, it would have given a natural and easy connection with the system of roads running through the State of Arkansas, taking Memphis as the base. Even the Texas route, which the Senator from Texas thinks is the best one to the Pacific, could connect with the one which I proposed, by a slight divergence, instead of crossing at El Paso, going by way of Fort Belknap, and connecting at Albuquerque. That route would give connection with all the railroad systems in the United States; it would be equally just to the North, equally just to the center, and equally just to the extreme South. That proposition was voted down—voted down by that same numerical northern strength which, I presume, in this body as well as the other, is determined, if it has a road at all, to have one North, and not to give the South any of its benefits. My opinion is, that the numerical strength of the northern States is determined that if the Government aid is brought to the construction of the road at all, it shall inure to their benefit, and to the advantage of no other portion of the Union. Believing that this is the policy of the northern members who have numerical power on this floor, as well as in the other House, and that we shall have no concession from them, I, for one, shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Louisiana, although I should be opposed to it if we could have justice at the hands of our northern brethren. I shall vote, therefore, for the indefinite postponement of this bill.

Mr. GWIN. Before the Senator from Georgia sits down; I should like to ask him a question. I ask him to state to the Senate how many votes from the southern States, in this body, he could have obtained for the plan he proposed.

Mr. IVERSON. Enough to carry the plan, if the northern votes would stick to it.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator would take it to a point which could get but a small minority of votes, and thus destroy the measure.

Mr. GREEN. I do not like to hear the question raised about the power of the North to carry the measure independent of the South, for this one plain, palpable reason: if this road be made, it will be made by the whole Union; and I do not like the whole Union to make a road for one section, nor do I believe that the public judgment of the North will sustain it. There are honesty and propriety there, and they will say that justice ought to prevail, even if the heavens fall. As we can have but a single trunk line of road, as that trunk line must be made by the nation, it ought to be so located as to inure to the common benefit of the whole; not the North, not the South, not the center exclusively. But if, in locating it so as to accommodate all sections, it should be that Missouri and Ohio and Indiana and Illinois participate more largely and more freely in its benefits than other sections of the Union, owing to the peculiarity of their location, there is no reason why the North or the South ought to complain.

The line of this road is a small matter; the termini is an important matter. On the west you say San Francisco. Why not leave it open, as the Senator from Texas has well said, to select San Diego, or some other port on the Pacific? In California you yourself are enough to designate a certain point. When you come east, and approach the Atlantic States, you leave a wide margin to play upon, for the purpose of deceiving somebody that votes for the bill. I will not vote for a Pacific railroad that does not do justice to the whole Union; I will not vote for one that inures, from its location, entirely to the benefit of the North; I will not vote for one that inures, from its location, entirely to the benefit of the South; nor would I vote for it if the benefit would result entirely to the center; but I go for the center for the very plain reason that, while it benefits the center, it gives equal advantages to the North and to the South.

I object to this bill because, while it undertakes to locate the western terminus, it leaves the eastern indefinite. I object to it because the reason assigned for leaving the eastern terminus floating, uncertain, indefinite, is, that it cannot pass if it should be fixed at a certain point. If it cannot pass if fixed at a certain point, it ought not to pass. If we pass it because it is left floating, when we could not pass it if it were fixed definitely and certainly, we commit a fraud upon each other, and upon the country; and I am not willing to commit a fraud upon any one. Locate this road at the mouth of the Big Sioux, if you please, and how many votes will you get to pass it? The Senator from California seems to think that he ought to accommodate the northern votes more than the southern, because he will get more strength from the North than the South! You may, in votes on on the bill, in the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I said no such thing.

Mr. GREEN. I understood that to be the drift of the Senator's argument.

Mr. GWIN. I stated that when you located the line on a route having only a small minority of the Senate in its favor, you were fixing it so that the bill must be defeated.

Mr. GREEN. I understand the Senator. He asked how many votes it would get if it was put there. I understand what that means; he cannot deceive me by his argument. I know all that is covered up in the meaning of that question. When he puts the question to a southern man, "how many votes could I get, if it were located?" it means, "I do locate it where I can get so many votes by locating it in the manner I indicate." It is a question of votes, not a question of justice and propriety. I do not like that; and while I would take the Senator from California by the hand, and cordially cooperate with him in the consummation of this great work, I cannot meet him in the mode he has now indicated for acting. I want the eastern Territories located as well as the western; for, as the Senator from Texas has remarked, San Francisco is not the State of California, nor is it the center of the Union. It is a great place, a prominent point, and one at which commerce concentrates. I am proud of it, and proud of her representatives.

Mr. BRODERICK. The population of the State is north of San Francisco.

Mr. GREEN. The population of the State may be. I say nothing against San Francisco; but if it be proper to designate San Francisco as the western terminus, take the most suitable point east, and designate it as the eastern terminus; or, if you say that it is wrong to designate any terminus, leave it an open question for the contractors and the executive department; leave it open on the west, and perhaps they may select San Diego, or some other port on the Pacific. But there is regard enough paid to San Francisco to say that she shall be a terminus; while on the east we say: "we will not designate the point, because we shall lose votes by so doing." Mr. President, I cannot subscribe to a doctrine like that. I intend to advocate this measure as a practicable measure, as one fraught with benefit to the State of Missouri, as one fraught with general benefit to the whole Union; but I will not undertake to decide either the South or the North. I shall go for what I believe to be right for all.

Mr. WILSON. The State I represent, Mr. President, is in favor of a Pacific railway. The sentiment of Massachusetts approaches unanimity on that subject. I have been, and now am, in favor of building a railway to the Pacific ocean. I have nothing, and I think the people I represent have nothing, of that sectional feeling that has been alluded to, in regard to its location, by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN.] The people I represent, sir, are a manufacturing and commercial people. They believe that a railway to the Pacific ocean is a national necessity. They are in favor of building a railroad as soon as it can be practically accomplished; and they are in favor of building it over the best route, whether it lies towards the north or the south; and whichever way it will go, they know it will contribute to the power and prosperity of our section of the Union—the great manufacturing and commercial section, where capital and business centers from all parts of our country. I assure Senators that the people of Massachusetts have none of the little, narrow, sectional feelings, which would exclude the South, or any portion of our common country, from the full benefits of the railway to our Pacific possessions. We welcome the completion of lines of railways in the West and in the South; and we have contributed more than our share of the capital employed in building those lines of railways, which bring together all sections of our country, facilitate and enlarge commerce, and develop the resources of the country.

But, sir, with these sentiments, I think it best to postpone this bill until December next; and I will state, very briefly, the reasons why I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] In the first place, we have nothing very definite before us, nothing on which we can act understandingly in regard to the location of this road. There is a diversity of opinion in the Senate and in the country upon the subject; and before we can settle on the best route to the Pacific, there must be more knowledge, more examination, and more unanimity of sentiment and of interest. This is a stupendous undertaking. I believe that every dollar invested in a Pacific railroad, over any line, is to be sunk; and that not less than two hundred million dollars will have to be sunk to complete such a road. I believe further, that when such a road is completed, it will not pay running expenses for years. But the completion of a road across the continent will bind this country together, will be of incalculable benefit to commerce and manufactures, and to the development of the agricultural interests and power of the country. We can afford to sink $200,000,000 to complete a road which will thus develop the resources and power of the whole nation, bind the country together with iron bands, and increase the sentiment of nationality.

If any man familiar with the railroad lines of this country, will examine the subject, he will find that the stock of these great railway lines, built through settled regions, connecting large commercial points, and having large way travel, are not worth, in the aggregate, fifty cents upon the dollar. Take the great line from Portland, by way of Montreal, to Toronto; both the lines from Boston across Vermont, the Central and the Rutland lines; the Ogdensburg line; the lines from Boston to Buffalo, and westward; the Erie line; the line across Pennsylvania, from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh; the line from Baltimore to Wheeling; take the great lines of the West, the Michigan Central and Southern, the Illinois Central, and other lines, running through settled portions of the country, connecting the great commercial cities of the country; and they are not worth, in the aggregate, more than forty cents upon the dollar. Tens of millions of dollars have been sunk in these great lines of communication between important sections of the country—between great commercial cities, and over sections of the country well settled, giving vast amounts of way travel and freight. Sir, experience shows us that way passengers and freight are the main supports of lines of railroads. Over hundreds of miles of the Pacific railroad there can never be either way passengers or freight.

Railroads, Mr. President, are necessities, but millions of the money invested in them has been and will be sunk. We have invested more than nine hundred million dollars in railroads in this country, but it is not worth to-day more than three or four hundred million dollars; and yet the building of those lines of roads has increased the wealth and productive power of this country hundreds of millions of dollars. I believe the Pacific railroad will increase the productive power and wealth of the country millions and tens of millions, although I believe every dollar invested in making such a road will be lost to the stockholders, whether built by the Federal Government or by private enterprise. I do not believe in any of the visions that have been held up to the country, that ships are to come from Asia from China and the Indies and the isles of the Oriental seas, and land their precious cargoes at San Francisco, to be sent by railroad across the continent. The whole idea is ridiculous and absurd. Sir, the cost per ton would be from fifty to sixty dollars from San Francisco to Boston or New York; and do Senators think our fast sailing ships of this day, coming from Canton or Calcutta, could be drawn to San Francisco, and pay fifty dollars per ton freight, when it would not cost them ten dollars per ton more to go direct to the cities of the Atlantic?

Now, Mr. President, while I am in favor of this road, and in favor of its being built at the earliest moment, there is another objection to action at this time. Your Treasury is in no condition to undertake this, or any great undertaking. Your national Treasury is bankrupt. We borrowed $20,000,000 in December last. I should not be surprised if we were called upon by the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow more before the 7th day of June next. When your Secretary of the Treasury sent in his annual report, it excited a smile on the face of every intelligent business man in America who read it. Sir, you will find that on the 1st of July, instead of having $33,000,000 of revenue for the three last quarters of the fiscal year, you will get but little more than $21,000,000. I tell you, sir, you are hastening on, increasing the expenditures; they are greater than at any period in our history. Your revenue is altogether inadequate to your expenditures. Instead of embarking at this moment in an undertaking of this magnitude, it belongs to this Government to husband its resources, to increase its sources of revenue, to curtail its expenditures. Every intelligent man in the country understands this, and sees the necessity of such action.

Now, sir, the Federal Government is in no condition to embark in this great undertaking. The people are not in a condition to embark in it any more than our Government. If you look over the country you will find we are just emerging from—coming out of—one of the most sweeping commercial convulsions that ever came upon any people. We are hardly out of it yet. Our manufactures, our commerce, all departments of trade, are now depressed. There is no active surplus, capital in the country to invest in this undertaking; there are no capitalists in the country, North or South, to take hold of it. We have $900,000,000 invested in railroads, many of them unproductive, and they press with great force upon the business interests of the whole country. We have other great speculations and great undertakings that we entered into in the hour of our prosperity.

Instead of the Government and people embarking in new schemes now, the policy of the Government and people should be to husband our resources, concentrate our means, and put ourselves in a strong position. By so doing, in one or two years we shall be in a condition to enter on new undertakings and new expenditures. This is another reason why I think it best to put this bill over until December next. I think the intelligent, practical business men of the country, and the prudent public men of the country, will appreciate the force of this reason.

I do not believe there are any capitalists in this country to-day, from any section of the Union, North or South, with money to invest in this project. And if there be not, what will be the result of the passage of this bill at the present session? Men of capital—men who want to complete this great national undertaking—will not touch it, and the organization of this company will pass into the hands of a class of bankrupt hacks, commercial and political—men who have no money to invest in it—men who have no character to bring into the concern. Whenever we pass the Pacific railway bill, (and I hope we shall pass such a bill as soon as the country is in a condition to enter upon and to complete the work) we ought to have money in the national Treasury; we ought to be out of debt; we ought to be in the receipt of more than we expend, and invest that excess in this undertaking. The people ought to be out of debt. They ought to be in a sound condition, with a surplus to invest in the completion of this undertaking. Neither the Government nor the people are in that condition to-day. When that time comes you will find responsible men, men who enter on this undertaking comprehending its magnitude and its importance, practical business men, who go into this work to complete the road.

But, sir, pass this bill now, when your Government is in no condition to touch it, when the people have no capital to invest in it, and the organization of the company will, of course, pass into irresponsible hands, and the result will be that it will be in the hands of a class of men who will damn the whole concern. No responsible man will invest a dollar in it, or have anything to do with it. I say, sir, pass this bill in the present condition of the country, and the present condition of the capital of the country, and the people of the country and responsible men will not touch it, but irresponsible men will take it—men who have nothing to lose and everything to gain—and the result will be that the whole concern will be odious and unpopular, and nothing will be achieved towards completing this great national work.

Now, sir, looking to the condition of the Government, looking to the condition of the people of the country, looking to the difference existing everywhere in and out of Congress in regard to the location of the road, I think the motion made by the Senator from Louisiana that we lay it over until December next, a good one. When the national Treasury and the country shall be in a good condition, then we can take the question up and legislate intelligently on this subject. But I shall regard the passage of this bill at this time, instead of being something towards the building of this road, as putting a stumbling block and a hindrance to its completion, and that it will pass into the hands of an irresponsible, bankrupt class of men, who have neither money nor character, and who will ruin the whole enterprise. For these reasons, although I intend to give my support to the completion of a Pacific railroad, I shall vote to postpone this bill until December next.

MR. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have witnessed with deep regret the indications that this measure is to be defeated at the present session of Congress. I had hoped that this Congress would signalize itself by inaugurating the great measure of connecting the Mississippi valley with the Pacific ocean by a railroad. I had supposed that the people of the United States had decided that question at the last presidential election in a manner so emphatic as to leave no doubt that their will was to be carried into effect. I believe that all the presidential candidates at the last election were committed to the measure. All the presidential platforms sanctioned it as a part of their creed. I believe it is about the only measure on which there was entire unanimity; and it is a very curious fact that the measure which commanded universal approbation—the measure upon which all parties united; a measure against which no man could be found, previous to the election, to raise his voice—should be the one that can receive no support, nor the cooperation of any one party, while disputed measures can occupy the whole time of Congress, and can be carried through successfully. I make no complaint of any political party, nor of any gentleman who opposes this bill; but it did strike me that it was a fact to be noticed, that a measure of this description, so long before the country, so well understood by the people, and receiving such universal sanction from them, should not be carried into effect. If the bill which has been devised by the committee is not the best that can be framed, let it be amended and modified until its objectionable features shall be removed. Let us not make a test question of this particular form of bill or that particular form; of this particular route or that particular route; of the benefits to this section or that section. If there is anything wrong in the details, in the form, in the construction of the bill, let the objectionable features be removed, and carry out the great object of a railroad communication between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean.

Various objections have been raised to this bill, some referring to the route, involving sectional considerations; others to the form of the bill; others to the present time as inauspicious for the construction of such a railroad under any circumstances. Sir, I have examined this bill very carefully. I was a member of the committee that framed it, and I gave my cordial assent to the report. I am free to say that I think it is the best bill that has ever been reported to the Senate of the United States for the construction of a Pacific railroad. I say this with great disinterestedness, for I have heretofore reported several myself, and I believe I have invariably been a member of the committees that have reported such bills. I am glad to find that we have progressed to such an extent as to be able to improve on the former bills that have, from time to time, been brought before the Senate of the United States. This may not be perfect. It is difficult to make human legislation entirely perfect; at any rate, to so construct it as to bring about an entire unanimity of opinion upon a question that involves, to some extent, selfish, sectional, and partisan considerations. But, sir, I think this bill is fair. First, it is fair in the location of the route, as between the different sections. The termini are fixed. Then the route between the termini is to be left to the contractors and owners of the road, who are to put their capital into it, and, for weal or for woe, are to be responsible for its management.

What is the objection to these termini? San Francisco, upon the Pacific, is not only central, but it is the great commercial mart, the great concentrating point, the great entrepot for the commerce of the Pacific, not only in the present, but in the future. And that point was selected as the western terminus for the reason that there seemed to be a unanimous sentiment, that whatever might be the starting point on the east, the system would not be complete until it should reach the city of San Francisco on the west. I suggested myself, in the committee, the selection of that very point; not that I had any objection to other points; not that I was any more friendly to San Francisco and her inhabitants than to any other port on the Pacific; but because I believed that to be the commanding port, the large city where trade concentrates, and its position indicated it as the proper terminus on the Pacific ocean.

Then, in regard to the eastern terminus, a point on the Missouri river is selected, for various reasons. One is, that it is central as between the North and South—as nearly central as could be selected. It was necessary to commence on the Missouri river, if you were going to take a central route, in order that the starting point might connect with navigation, so that you might reach it by boats, in carrying your iron, your supplies, and your materials, for the commencement and the construction of the road. It was essential that you should commence at a point of navigation so that you could connect with the sea-board. If you start it at a point back in the interior five hundred or a thousand miles, as it is proposed, at El Paso, from the navigable waters of the Mississippi, it would cost you more money to carry the iron, provisions, supplies, and men to that starting point, than it would to make a road from the Mis-

Mississippi to the starting point, in order to begin your road. In that case it would be a matter of economy to make a road to your starting point in order to begin. Hence, in my opinion, it would be an act of folly to think of starting a railroad to the Pacific at a point eight hundred or a thousand miles in the interior, away from any connection with navigable water, or with other railroads already in existence.

For these reasons we agreed in the bill to commence on the Missouri river. When you indicate that river, a little diversity of opinion arises as to what point on the river shall be selected. There are various respectable, thriving towns on either bank of the river, each of which thinks it is the exact position where the road ought to commence. I suppose that Kansas City, Wyandott, Weston, Leavenworth, Atchison, Platte's Mouth City, Omaha, De Soto, Sioux City, and various other towns whose names have not become familiar to us, and have found no resting place on the map, each thinks that it has the exact place where the road should begin. Well, sir, I do not desire to have any preference between these towns; either of them would suit me very well; and we leave it to the contractors to say which shall be the one. We leave the exact eastern terminus open, for the reason that the public interests will be substantially as well served by the selection of the one as the other. It is not so at the western terminus. San Francisco does not occupy that relation to the towns on the Pacific coast that these little towns on the Missouri river do to the country east of the Missouri. The public have no material interest in the question whether it shall start at the mouth of the Kansas, at Weston, at Leavenworth, at St. Joseph, at Platte's Mouth, or at Sioux City. Either connects with the great lines; either would be substantially central as between north and south. So far as I am concerned, I should not care a sixpence which of those towns was selected as the starting point, because they start there upon a plain that stretches for eight hundred miles, and can connect with the whole railroad system of the country. You can go directly west. You can bend to the north and connect with the northern roads, or bend to the south and connect with the southern roads.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Iverson] would be satisfied, as I understand, with the termini, if we had selected one intermediate point, so as to indicate the route that should be taken between the termini. I understand that he would be satisfied if we should indicate that it should go south of Santa Fe, so as to include as the probable route the Albuquerque route, or the one on the thirty-fifth parallel, or the one south of it. Sir, I am free to say that, individually, I should have no objection to the route indicated by the Senator from Georgia. I have great faith that the Albuquerque route is an exceedingly favorable one; favorable in its grades, in the shortness of its distances, in its climate, the absence of deep snow, and in the topography of the country. While it avoids very steep grades, it furnishes perhaps as much of grass, of timber, of water, of materials necessary for the construction and repair of the road, if not more than any other route. As a northern man, living upon the great line of the lakes, you cannot indicate a route that I think would subserve our interests, and the great interests of this country, better than that; yet, if I expressed the opinion that the line ought to go on that route between the termini, some other man would say it ought to go on Governor Stevens's extreme northern route; some one else would say it ought to go on the South Pass route; and we should divide the friends of the measure as to the point at which the road should pass the mountains—whether at the extreme north, at the center, the Albuquerque route, or the further southern one down in Arizona—and we should be unable to decide between ourselves which was best.

I have sometimes thought that the extreme northern route, known as the Stevens' route, was the best, as furnishing better grass, more timber, more water, more of those elements necessary in constructing, repairing, operating, and maintaining a road, than any other. I think now that the preference, merely upon routes, is between the northern or Stevens' route on the one side, and the Albuquerque route on the other. Still, as I never expect to put a dollar of money into the road, as I never expect to have any agency or connection with or interest in it, I am willing to leave the selection of the route between the termini to those who are to put their fortunes, and connect their character, with the road, and to be responsible, in the most tender of all points, if they make a mistake in the selection. But for these considerations, I should have cheerfully yielded to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, to fix the crossing point on the Rio Grande river.

But, sir, I am unwilling to lose this great measure merely because of a difference of opinion as to what shall be the pass selected in the Rocky Mountains through which the road shall run. I believe it is a great national measure. I believe it is the greatest practical measure now pending before the country. I believe that we have arrived at that period in our history when our great substantial interests require it. The interests of commerce, the great interests of travel and communication—those still greater interests that bind the Union together, and are to make and preserve the continent as one and indivisible—all demand that this road shall be commenced, prosecuted, and completed, at the earliest practicable moment.

I am unwilling to postpone the bill until next December. I have seen these postponements from session to session, for the last eight or ten years, with the confident assurance every year that at the next session we should have abundance of time to take up the bill and act upon it. Sir, will you be better prepared at the next session than now? We have now the whole summer before us, drawing our pay, and proposing to perform no service. Next December you will have but ninety days, with all the unfinished business left over, your appropriation bills on hand, and not only the regular bills, but the new deficiency bill; and you will postpone this measure again, for the want of time to consider it then. I think, sir, we had better grapple with the difficulties that surround this question now, when it is fairly before us, when we have time to consider it, and when I think we can act upon it as dispassionately, as calmly, as wisely, as we shall ever be able to do.

I have been sorry to see the question of sectional advantages brought into this discussion. If you are to have but one road, fairness and justice would plainly indicate that that one should be located as near the center as practicable. The Missouri river is as near the center and the line of this road is as near as it can be made; and if there is but one to be made, the route now indicated, in my opinion, is fair, is just, and ought to be taken. I have heretofore been of the opinion that we ought to have three roads: one in the center, one in the extreme south, and one in the extreme north. If I thought we could carry the three, and could execute them in any reasonable time, I would now adhere to that policy and prefer it; but I have seen enough here during this session of Congress to satisfy me that but one can pass, and to ask for three at this time is to lose the whole. Believing that that is the temper, that that is the feeling, and I will say, the judgment, of the members of both Houses of Congress, I prefer to take one road rather than to lose all in the vain attempt to get three. If there were to be three, of course the one indicated in this bill would be the central; one would be north of it, and another south of it. But if there is to be but one, the central one should be taken; for the north, by bending a little down south, can join it; and the south, by leaning a little to the north, can unite with it too; and our southern friends ought to be able to bend and lean a little, as well as to require us to bend and lean all the time, in order to join them. The central position is the just one, if there is to be but one road. The concession should be as much on the one side as on the other. I am ready to meet gentlemen half way on every question that does not violate principle, and they ought not to ask us to meet them more than half way where there is no principle involved, and nothing but expediency.

Then, sir, why not unite upon this bill? We are told it is going to involve the Government of the United States in countless millions of expenditure. How is that? Certainly not under this bill, not by authority of this bill, not without violating this bill. The bill under consideration provides that when a section of the road shall be made, the Government may advance a portion of the lands, and $12,500 per mile in bonds on the section thus made, in order to aid in the construction of the next, holding a lien upon the road for the refunding of the money thus advanced. Under this bill it is not possible that the contractors can ever obtain more than $12,500 per mile on each mile of the road that is completed. It is, therefore, very easy to compute the cost to the Government. Take the length of the road in miles, and multiply it by $12,500, and you have the cost. If you make the computation, you will find it will come to a fraction over twenty million dollars. The limitation in the bill is, that in no event shall it exceed $25,000,000. Therefore, by the terms of the bill, the undertaking of the Government is confined to $25,000,000; and, by the calculation, it will be less than that sum. Is that a sum that would bankrupt the Treasury of the United States?

I predict to you now, sir, that the Mormon campaign has cost, and has led to engagements and undertakings that, when redeemed, will cost more than twenty-five million dollars, if not double that sum. During the last six months, on account of the Mormon rebellion, expenses have been paid, and undertakings have been assumed, which will cost this Government more than the total expenditure which can possibly be made in conformity with the provisions of this bill. If you had had this railroad made you would have saved the whole cost which the Government is to advance in this little Mormon war alone. If you have a general Indian war in the mountains, it will cost you twice the amount called for by this bill. If you should have a war with a European Power, the construction of this road would save twenty-fold its cost in the transportation of troops and munitions of war to the Pacific ocean, in carrying on your operations.

In an economical point of view, I look upon it as a wise measure. It is one of economy as a war measure alone, or as a peace measure for the purpose of preventing a war. Whether viewed as a war measure, to enable you to check rebellion in a Territory, or hostilities with the Indians, or to carry on vigorously a war with a European Power, or viewed as a peace measure, it is a wise policy, dictated by every consideration of public convenience and public good.

Again, sir, in carrying the mails, it is an economical measure. As the Senator from Georgia has demonstrated, the cost of carrying the mails alone to the Pacific ocean for thirty years, under the present contracts, is double the amount of the whole expenditure under this bill for the same time in the construction and working of the road. In the transportation of mails, then, it would save twice its cost. The transportation of Army and Navy supplies would swell the amount three or four-fold. How many years will it be before the Government will receive back, in transportation, the whole cost of this advance of aid in the construction of the road?

But, sir, some gentlemen think it is an unsound policy leading to the doctrine of internal improvements by the Federal Government within the different States of the Union. We are told we must confine the road to the limits of the Territories, and not extend it into the States, because it is supposed that entering a State with this contract violates some great principle of State rights. Mr. President, the committee considered that proposition, and they avoided that objection, in the estimation of the most strict, rigid, tight-laced State-rights men that we have in the body. We struck out the provision in the bill first drawn, that the President should contract for the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean; and followed an example that we found on the statute-book, for carrying the mails from Alexandria to Richmond, Virginia—an act passed about the time when the resolutions of 1798 were passed, and the report of 1799 was adopted—an act that we thought came exactly within the spirit of those resolutions. That act, according to my recollection, was, that the Department be authorized to contract for the transportation of the United States mail by four horse post-coaches, with closed backs, so as to protect it from the weather and rain, from Alexandria to Richmond, in the State of Virginia. It occurred to this committee that if it had been the custom, from the beginning of this Government to this day, to make contracts for the transportation of the mails in four horse post-coaches, built in a particular manner, and the contractor left to furnish his own coaches and his own horses, and his own means of transportation, we might make a similar contract for the transportation of the mails by railroad from one point to another, leaving the contractor to make his own railroad, and furnish his own cars, and comply with the terms of the contract.

There is nothing in this bill that violates any one principle which has prevailed in every mail contract that has been made, from the days of Dr. Franklin down to the elevation of James Buchanan to the Presidency. Every contract for carrying the mail by horse, from such a point to such a point, in saddle-bags, involves the same principle. Every contract for carrying it from such a point to such a point in two horse hacks, with a covering to protect it from the storm, covers the same principle. Every contract to carry it from such a point to such a point in four horse coaches of a particular description, involves the same principle. You contracted to carry the mails from New York to Liverpool in ships of two thousand tons each, to be constructed according to a model prescribed by the Navy Department, leaving the contractor to furnish his own ships, and receive so much pay. That involves the same principle.

You have, therefore, carried out the principle of this bill in every contract you have ever had for mails, whether it be upon the land or upon the water. In every mail contract you have had, you have carried out the identical principle involved in this bill—simply the right to contract for the transportation of the United States mails, troops, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, at fair prices, in the manner you prescribed, leaving the contracting party to furnish the mode of transportation. That is all there is in it. I do not see how it can violate any party creed, how it can violate any principle of State rights, how it can interfere with any man's conscientious scruples. Then, sir, where is the objection?

If you look on this as a measure of economy and a commercial measure, the argument is all in favor of the bill. It is true, the Senator from Massachusetts has suggested that it is idle to suppose that the trade of China is to center in San Francisco, and then pay sixty dollars a ton for transportation across the continent by a railroad to Boston. It was very natural that he should indicate Boston, as my friend from Georgia might, perhaps, have thought of Savannah, or my friend from South Carolina might have indicated Charleston, or the Senator from Louisiana might have indicated New Orleans. But I, living at the head of the great lakes, would have made the computation from Chicago, and my friend from Missouri would have thought it would have been very well, perhaps, to take it from the State of Missouri. When you are making this computation, I respectfully submit you must make the calculation from the sea-board to the center of the continent, and not charge transportation all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific; for suppose you do not construct this road, and these goods come by ship from Boston, it will cost something to take them by railroad from there to Chicago, and a little more to take them by railroad to the Missouri river, half-way back to San Francisco again. If you select the center of the continent, the great heart and center of the Republic—the Mississippi valley—as the point at which you are to concentrate your trade, and from which it is to diverge, you will find that the transportation to it by railroad would not be much greater from San Francisco than from Boston. It would be nearly the same from the Pacific that it is from the Atlantic; and the calculation must be made in that point of view. There is the center of consumption, and the center of those great products that are sent abroad in all quarters to pay for articles imported. The center of production, the center of consumption, the future center of the population of the continent, is the point to which, and from which, your calculation should be made.

Then, sir, if it costs sixty dollars per ton for transportation from San Francisco to Boston by railroad, half-way you may say it will cost thirty dollars a ton. The result, then, of coming from San Francisco to the center by railroad, would be to save transportation by ship from San Francisco to Boston, in addition to the railroad transportation into the interior.

But, sir, I dissent from a portion of the gentleman's argument, so far as it relates to transportation even from San Francisco to Boston. I admit that heavy articles of cheap value and great bulk, would go by ship; that being the cheapest mode of communication; but light articles, costly articles, expensive articles, those demanded immediately, and subject to decay from long voyages and delays, would come directly across by railroad, and what you would save in time would be more than the extra expense of the transportation. You must add to that the risk of the tropics, which destroys many articles, and that process which is necessary to be gone through with to prepare articles for the sea-voyage, is to be taken into the account. I have had occasion to witness that defect in one article of beverage very familiar to you all. Let any man take one cup of tea that came from China to Russia overland, without passing twice under the equator, and he will never be reconciled to a cup of tea that has passed under the equator. The genuine article, that has not been manipulated and prepared to pass under the equator, is worth ten to one that which we receive here. Preparation is necessary to enable it to pass under the tropics, and the long, damp voyage makes as much difference in the article of tea as the difference between a green apple and a dried apple, green corn and dried corn, sent abroad. So you will find it to be with fruits; so it will be with all the expensive and precious articles, and especially those liable to decay and to injury, either by exposure to a tropical climate, or to the moisture of a long sea-voyage.

Then, sir, in a commercial point of view, this road will be of vast importance. There is another consideration that I will allude to for a moment. It will extend our trade more than any other measure that you can devise, certainly more than any one that you now have in contemplation. The people are all anxious for the annexation of Cuba so soon as it can be obtained on fair and honorable terms—and why? In order to get the small, pitiful trade of that island. We all talk about the great importance of Central America, in order to extend our commerce; it is valuable to the extent it goes. But Cuba, Central America, and all the islands surrounding them, put together, are not a thousandth part of the value of the great East India trade that would be drawn first to our western coast, and then across to the valley of the Mississippi, if this railroad be constructed. Sir, if we intend to extend our commerce; if we intend to make the great ports of the world tributary to our wealth, we must prosecute our trade eastward or westward, as you please; we must penetrate the Pacific, its islands, and its continent, where the great mass of the human family reside, where the articles that have built up the powerful nations of the world have always come from. That is the direction in which we should look for the expansion of our commerce and of our trade. That is the direction our public policy should take—a direction that is facilitated by the great work now proposed to be made.

I care not whether you look at it in a commercial point of view, as a matter of administrative economy at home, as a question of military defense, or in reference to the building up of the national wealth, and power, and glory; it is the great measure of the age—a measure, that in my opinion has been postponed too long—and I frankly confess to you, that I regard the postponement to next December to mean, till after the next presidential election. No man hopes or expects, when you have not time to pass it in the early spring, at the long session, that you are going to consider it at the short session. When you come here at the next session, the objection will be that you must not bring forward a measure of this magnitude, because it will affect the political relations of parties, and it will be postponed then, as it was two years ago, to give the glory to the incoming Administration, each party probably thinking that it would have the honor of carrying out the measure. Hence, sir, I regard the proposition of postponement till December, to mean till after the election of 1860.

I desire to see all the pledges made in the last contest redeemed during this term, and let the next President, and the parties under him, redeem the pledges and obligations assumed during the next campaign. The people of all parties at the last presidential election decreed that this road was to be made. The question is now before us. We have time to consider it. We have all the means necessary, as much now as we can have at any other time. The Senator from Massachusetts intimates that the Treasury being bankrupt now, we cannot afford the money. That Senator also remarked that we were just emerging from a severe commercial crisis—a great commercial revulsion—which had carried bankruptcy in its train. If we have just emerged from it, if we have passed it, this is the very time of all others when a great enterprise should be begun. It might have been argued when we saw that crisis coming, before it reached us, that we should furl our sails, and trim our ship for the approaching storm; but when it has exhausted its rage, when all the mischief has been done that could be inflicted, when the bright sun of day is breaking forth, when the sea is becoming calm, and there is but little visible of the past tempest, when the nausea of sea-sickness is succeeded by joyous exhilaration, inspired by the hope of a fair voyage, let men feel elated and be ready to commence a great work like this, so as to complete it before another commercial crisis or revulsion shall come upon us.

Sir, if you pass this bill no money can be expended under it until one section of the road has been made. The surveys must be completed, the route must be located, the land set aside and surveyed, and a section of the road made before a dollar can be drawn from the Treasury. If you pass the bill now, it cannot make any drain on the Treasury for at least two years to come; and who doubts that all the effects of the late crisis will have passed away before the expiration of those two years?

Mr. President, this is the auspicious time, either with a view to the interests of the country, or to that stagnation which exists between political parties which is calculated to make it a measure of the country rather than a partisan measure, or to the commercial and monetary affairs of the nation, or with reference to the future. Look upon it in any point of view, now is the time; and I am glad that the Senator from Louisiana has indicated, as I am told he has, that the motion for postponement is a test question; for I confess I shall regard it as a test vote on a Pacific railroad during this term, whatever it may be in the future. I hope that we shall pass the bill now.

Mr. BELL. I have said so much, Mr. President, on this subject at former sessions, that I do not propose to detain the Senate at present.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the honorable Senator will give way, and I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish it on my account.

Mr. SEWARD. With the leave of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Biggs, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wade—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderrick, Brown, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hale, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sillidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, and Wright—29.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BELL. I was remarking, sir, that I had expressed my sentiments so often heretofore on this subject that I should not detain the Senate by going into any expression of them now. I desire merely to say that I have not changed the opinions I have so often expressed as to the importance of this measure, whether regarded in an economical view, or as a means of advancing the great interests of the country, and its foreign and domestic trade and commerce. Looking at it in an economical point of view, if the Government of this Union means to perform its obligations in the protection of our advancing settlements in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and in the intermediate space between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, and on the Pacific coast, in the event of a war with any great maritime Power, and if it means to perform its duties in affording mail communications between the Atlantic and our settlements on the Pacific, I think that even if it should cost a hundred millions, or a hundred and fifty, or two hundred millions, it would still promote the economical administration of this Government. If we mean to hold possession of the States and Territories on the Pacific, it can scarcely be done for four or five times the cost which this Government would have to expend in the construction of this road. I mean, that the annual interest which would have to be paid on any debt this Government might incur for such purposes, would be several times greater than the interest on the advances proposed to be made by the Government to aid in the construction of this road.

Fearing, lest if the bill should now be postponed, and placed beyond the power of the Senate during the rest of the session, it might be supposed, from my silence, that I had changed my former opinions, I rose simply for the purpose of stating that I adhere to them. I think the bill is a great measure of public policy in connection with the discharge of the duties of this Government in the protection of an interior frontier, which is both a western and an eastern frontier, and in connection with other great questions concerning the progress of this country, its advance in wealth, power, and trade. I desired to add a further remark or two in reference to this particular bill. I do not concur in the idea that its provisions are particularly fair in reference to the different sections of the Union. I am aware the representatives of any particular locality can hardly have the eastern terminus of such a road as this at a point which would be most promotive of their immediate interests; but, in my advocacy of this road, I go upon the great catholic idea, as I hope that its benefits will redound to every section of the Union, wherever its eastern terminus may be, or wherever the western terminus may be, provided it be on the Pacific ocean, still, I think it is the duty of members here, so far as it can be effected by appeals to the judgment, the reason, the equity, and the justice of the representatives of other sections, to have it located in such manner as to diffuse its benefits as widely as possible, and equalize them as far as possible. I think that fixing the eastern terminus at a point between Sioux City and the mouth of the Kansas, in the mode provided in this bill, does not do justice to the southwestern range of States and Territories. I am not sure that it is altogether just to the middle section; but it is more just to them than to the South and Southwest. It is a very large departure from a medium line. If the terminus should be upon a line with St. Louis or Cairo, it would offer greater equality, both to the North and the South than probably any other point which might be indicated, and I do not see any insuperable objection to the location of the eastern terminus upon that line of latitude, whatever route may finally be adopted in passing the Sierra Nevada. I trust that, in the further discussion of this bill, it can be shown, to the satisfaction of many gentlemen not satisfied with the location proposed in the bill, that an intermediate line may be selected.

If I had time, I should like to bring to the notice of the Senate a few views as to the practicability of the scheme; for that seems to be the great difficulty, the insurmountable barrier in the minds of many gentlemen. I understand that a road is being constructed through Texas, for which that State has granted a large amount of public lands; and a connection from the terminus of that road to the Pacific would perhaps be attended with the least expense to the Government, and its construction would answer all great national purposes; for, I repeat, wherever you locate the terminus, the western frontier and all the Atlantic States will receive some portion of the benefit. Of course, that section which has the terminus located within its own limits would have greater facilities, but the advantages would redound from the extreme north to the extreme south, and you could not prevent it.

But again, sir, the shortest route undoubtedly lies on the parallel of 35° north latitude. Any gentleman who will look into the information that has been spread before the country by the various explorations of our skillful officers, under the direction and authority of Congress, and will concentrate and digest the various reports, will find that that offers the shortest route, at all events, and, in my judgment, on the whole, the most practicable. On that route there is not more than seventeen hundred miles from our western border to where you strike the Pacific coast, at the lower part of California, at San Pedro or Los Angeles, from whence to San Francisco a practical route exists, as we all know, on which a road could be constructed by the authority of the State of California, with our aid in land. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, with reference to this route, to test the sense of the Senate upon it. I trust that I shall have an opportunity to do so.

Why should we postpone the bill until next December, and thus remove this question from us? It is said we have not time to consider it now. As the honorable Senator from Illinois has well asked, when shall we have more time to discuss and consider this question than we have now? We have bound ourselves by a voluntary vote of restriction; but that can be rescinded, if it is our pleasure to extend the time of the session, with a view to discuss, consider, and dispose of a great measure of this kind. I do not mean to enlarge on its importance, but I think it is of public importance and public utility that such a question as this should be discussed here. We want to lay additional information before the country. To be sure, a great deal has been gleaned by these various explorations, and their reports have been printed; but this is the center, from which practical, effective information reaches the country. It is through the debates of Congress. If we could only discuss this question some seven or eight days, or even three or four days, more than it has already been discussed, it would be of some importance. It is of importance to keep the question alive before the people of the country, according to my view.

We have as much time now as we are ever likely to have. I do not know what may be the motives of gentlemen in favoring a postponement. The honorable Senator from Illinois suggests that it is to lie over until another presidential contest. I hope that is not meditated. I know it is said that the Treasury is now in such a state that a measure of this kind should not be contemplated; but the fact is, that the bill does not propose to appropriate a cent of money from the Treasury. We can incur an expense of twenty or thirty, or it may be of forty million dollars, by an Executive internal war, undertaken without the authority or consent of Congress; but we are reminded of the exhausted condition of the Treasury when it is only proposed that, after the lapse of two or three years, bonds shall be issued according to the progress of the construction of the road, which bonds are to be refunded in service for the Government. I think there is really nothing of substance in the objection as to the present condition of the Treasury, unless we are to suppose that the trade and commerce and business enterprises of the country are never to revive from the severity of the late revulsion.

Other subjects have engrossed the attention of both Houses of Congress to such an extent that this has been excluded from our minds, and has not occupied that space to which its magnitude entitles it; but have we no hope that within a very short period we shall be relieved from the pressure of other questions that are more pressing, if not more important than the present? I trust there is such a hope. I trust that within a very short time we shall have a termination of that difficulty which has stood in the way of all practical legislation.

I say then, Mr. President, there is nothing in the argument drawn from the depressed condition of the Treasury, nor is there anything in the argument that we shall have more leisure at the next session. If we shall not be pressed then (as I hope we shall not be) by the same question which has so exclusively engaged our attention at the present session, there are always enough matters to occupy a short session. Perhaps the condition of the Treasury may require almost our exclusive attention at the next session. I do not hear gentlemen intimate that they desire to occupy the remainder of this session with the discussion of some great financial measure, to relieve permanently the wants of the Treasury; but all the information I have from gentlemen who ought to know better than I do the views of the Government and the majority here, satisfies me that they do not propose to give any serious attention to that subject at this session. That must be postponed to the next session.

But, Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. I have said more than I intended to say when I rose. My object merely was to have it understood that I have not changed my position in relation to this measure. I think there is nothing in the arguments which have been urged in favor of its postponement, and I shall vote against that motion.

Mr. KING. If this bill were presented for its final passage, in the form in which the committee have reported it, I think I should vote against it; but I am not prepared, by a vote to postpone the bill, to indicate an opinion decidedly against the construction of such a road. We must have a road connecting the Pacific and the Atlantic States, and in some way it must be constructed. I regard the propriety of the Federal Government interfering with it as a matter allowing of some doubt, and yet still I know of no other mode in which such a road can be constructed but by the rendition of some aid to it by the Federal Government.

There is one feature in this bill to which I object, and that is the large appropriation of public lands for the proposed road. I am opposed to the great monopoly of landed interest which the immense grants to railroads have produced in this country. I have voted against them heretofore, and I am favorable to the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and by other Senators, to give homesteads to actual settlers. I think that is about the best disposition we can make of the public lands. I should have preferred, if we could have done so, to have retained the public lands for sale under the established land system of the country; but I am satisfied that cannot be done much longer; and without designing to indicate any opinion—indeed, with the intention of reserving an opinion as to the propriety of voting for any Pacific railroad bill which may be presented at this session—I shall vote against the indefinite postponement, because I am not willing to give it the go-by in that way.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have been requested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. JONES] to state that he has paired off with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Brown, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Dixon, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Hale, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitch, Foot, Green, Gwin, Henderson, Kennedy, King, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wright—22.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the first Monday of December next.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 17, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE W. COOMBS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that reports were in order on private business from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution calling for information necessary to a proper understanding of a bill of a private nature.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, let us allow the committees to report private bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a bill of which previous notice has been given, which I desire to introduce for reference only.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Upon applications made to me I withdraw the motion to go into committee.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I renew it.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. All the committees have private bills to report, and I hope an hour will be devoted to that purpose.

Mr. DAVIDSON withdrew his motion.

JAMES B. STEADMAN.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back a memorial referred by mistake to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but I have called for the regular order of business, and I want to treat all gentlemen alike.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is a matter which requires prompt action, and which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means by mistake.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my objection. On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James B. Steadman, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine; and An act (S. No. 51) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless.

When the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 197) providing for the arrest and return of fugitives from justice to the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 78) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue land warrants to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef;

An act (S. No. 101) for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. J. O'Brien, late of the United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 118) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel A. House;

An act (S. No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register, or enrollment and license, to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825;

An act (S. No. 129) to provide for the final settlement of the land claim of the heirs of Jehu Underwood in Florida;

An act (S. No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society;

An act (S. No. 160) for the relief of Thomas J. Page;

An act (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793;

In which he was requested to ask the concurrence of the House.

COMMITTEES DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. DOWDELL, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of M. B. Jones, late collector of customs at Wilmington, North Carolina, and of the petition of David G. Burnett, and that the same be referred, the first to the Committee of Claims, and the second to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. COMINS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ludlow Franklin and others, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, and that the same be laid upon the table.

TOWNSHIP LANDS IN INDIANA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of congressional township No. 27 north, of range six east, in Wabash county, in the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the auditor of the county of Wabash to enter, in his own official name, five hundred and fifty-seven and ninety-one hundredths acres in legal sub-divisions of any lands of the United States, subject to private entry at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre for the benefit of said township, in lieu of a deficit in the quantity of school lands belonging to said township.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire to have this bill put upon its passage, and I ask for the reading of the report of the committee, and move the previous question.

The report was read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire to say a few words in relation to this bill. I will take up only a few minutes of the time of the House, as there cannot be any objection to the bill. It appears, by the petition and by the evidence before the committee, that section sixteen, of township No. 27, north of range six east, in Wabash county, Indiana, was deficient in quantity to the extent of five hundred and fifty-seven and ninety-one hundredths acres, on account of Indian locations or reservations. By an act of Congress, of 1826, each congressional township is authorized to make up any deficiency covered by Indian reservations or locations, or otherwise. They are confined; however, to the land districts to make their selections to supply deficiencies. In this case, on two several occasions, these selections were made by the proper authorities of the county of Wabash. They were sent to the Secretary of the Interior, and were set aside by him, because these selections were covered by locations of the Wabash and Erie Canal, or by private claims. Now, there are but one hundred and five acres of public land within that district, and they are totally worthless, consisting of islands of four and five acres each.

Now, sir, this bill authorizes this congressional township, to the extent of five hundred and fifty-seven acres, to be located upon any lands of the United States, subject to private entry at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, for the purpose of supplying this deficiency. It is asked upon the ground that there are no lands within that land district worth anything.

Mr. BURNETT. Will it be in order to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. It should be done. Neither the bill nor report has been printed, and we are required to vote upon it without knowing anything about it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, demanded the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make one inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana. Does this bill authorize that township to be located on land in some other part of the country, outside of that district?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I object to it. There is no precedent for it; and I call the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The gentleman says there is no precedent. I say there is a precedent. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISCHARGE OF COMMITTEE.

On motion of Mr. WALBRIDGE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims:

The petition of Charles James Lawrence, asking compensation for clerk hire and office rent;

The petition of E. Yulee, asking compensation for extra clerk hire in the land office at Olympia; and

The petition of John Biddle and Jonathan Kearsley, praying certain allowances to reimburse them for moneys paid for services of clerks in the land office at Detroit, in the years 1834, 1835, and 1836.

PAY TO CERTAIN CLERKS IN OREGON.

Mr. WALBRIDGE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 169) making an appropriation for the payment of clerks employed in the offices of the registers of the land offices in Oregon City and Winchester, in the Territory of Oregon; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I judge, from hearing the title of that bill, that it is a general and not a private bill.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The bill provides for the payment of clerks already employed, and who have already rendered services. It is a private claim.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it is a general bill. There is no law for their employment; and if they were employed, they were employed on the responsibility of the registers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know anything about it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there is a law for it, there would be an estimate made by the Department to pay them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not understand how the Committee on Public Lands obtained possession of that matter. I should like to know if that subject-matter was referred to them.

The SPEAKER. The bill itself was referred to them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I suppose there is no law authorizing the employment of those clerks, or their payment. The officers of the land office have taken the responsibility, and now they come here and ask for the payment of liabilities which they pretend they have incurred.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I wish to say that the business at the land office in Oregon absolutely required an additional clerical force. A law was passed in regard to the disposition of lands in that Territory, and that law made it indispensably necessary, for the discharge of the duties of the land office there, that clerks should be hired, and they were hired. The persons who were employed have not received any pay, and they now come to Congress and ask that pay shall be given them. It is the opinion of the local land office, of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and of the Secretary of the Interior, that they should be paid.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I hope this bill will be informally passed over until the Delegate from Oregon [Mr. LANE] comes in; for, as I understand, he takes a great interest in this question, and has a word to say on it.

The question was taken on the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it was disagreed to.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report were ordered to be printed.

ISAAC BOWDY AND SAMUEL FLEMING.

Mr. WALBRIDGE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill for the relief of Isaac Bowdy and Samuel Fleming, and moved that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope that the bill will be put on its passage.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I have no objection, as I believe that the case is clearly right.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope not, but that the House will go on with the call on committees for reports. If we go on as we have, we will consume the morning hour with these little bills.

The bill was read through. It authorizes the parties named to enter quarter sections of land in the Springfield, Illinois, land district.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope that my friend from Michigan will withdraw his motion that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and let the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] It affects the interest of two of his constituents,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, APRIL 20, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 104.

and I think it is right and ought to pass. My preference is that the bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, but the gentleman from Illinois may make what motion he pleases. I will withdraw my motion to refer to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I renew it, and call for the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope that the motion to refer will be voted down. These men are anxious to secure a title to their land, as they are liable to be deprived of it at any moment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the call for the previous question be sustained, and the motion to refer be voted down, will it not be in order to put the bill on its passage?

The SPEAKER. It will. The previous question will not be exhausted until the bill is read a third time.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 51.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 64.

So the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

S. N. HOLLODAY AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. COBB, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of House bill (No. 413) for the relief of S. N. Holloday and others, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MILITARY BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. COBB. I hold in my hand numerous petitions, which have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, asking for the passage of certain bills of relief. The committee have prepared a general bill on the subject, and I ask if it would be in order for me to report it to-day, as originating from those petitions?

The SPEAKER. Not on this call, as it is a general bill.

The bill which Mr. COBB desired to report, is as follows:

A bill for an act supplemental to the laws respecting military bounty land warrants.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when proof has been, or shall hereafter be, filed in the Pension Office, during the lifetime of a claimant, establishing to the satisfaction of that office, his or her right to a warrant for military services, and such warrant has not been, or may not hereafter be, issued until after the death of the claimant, the title to such warrant shall vest in the widow, if there be one, and if there be no widow, then in the heirs of the warrantee; and all such warrants, and all other warrants issued pursuant to existing laws, shall be treated as personal chattels, and may be conveyed by assignment of such widow or heirs, or by the legal representatives of the deceased warrantee, for the use of such heirs only.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of the act approved March 22, 1852, to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes, shall be so extended as to embrace land warrants issued under the act of the 3d March, 1855.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. HORTON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the claim of R. F. M. Mann, of Georgia; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF ROBERT MORRIS.

Mr. HORTON also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert Morris, late postmaster of the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY ORNDORFF.

Mr. HORTON also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Henry Orndorff, of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN DEARMIT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John Dearmit; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill (No. 373) to provide for the election of postmasters by the people; which was laid upon the table.

STICKLEY AND ROGERS.

Mr. ATKINS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Stickley & Rogers; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM DOTY AND OTHERS.

Mr. ATKINS also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Doty and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. ATKINS also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of James M. Harris, of Florida; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

KIMBALL AND MOORE, ETC.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the accounts of Kimball & Moore, and Moore & Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

J. W. HILTON.

Mr. WOOD also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of J. W. Hilton; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATKINS, on behalf of Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the views of the minority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in the same case; which were also ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BILLINGHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented adverse reports on the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, asking for an additional judicial district in that State, on the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 18, touching the imprisonment of witnesses; and on the memorial of Samuel M. Puckett; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, from the same committee, reported back, with a resolution that it do not pass, House bill (No. 289,) increasing the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was laid on the table, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the same committee, presented an adverse report in the case of William A. Forward; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF HENRY KING.

Mr. CLAWSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the representatives of Henry King, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CHURCH AT PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. CLAWSON also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, New Jersey; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the same committee, presented an adverse report on the petition of the heirs of Andrew Russell; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOHN RIPLEY.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Major John Ripley; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF BENJAMIN WILSON.

Mr. COX, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin Wilson; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. ASHTON.

Mr. COX, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William R. Ashton, administrator of Dr. Benjamin Chapin, deceased, late a surgeon in the navy of the Revolution; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CURRY, from the same committee, presented adverse reports in the case of the heirs of Dr. William Rickman, of the heirs of Obadiah Hardestee, of William B. Goodwin, and of John McDowell; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF DAVID NOBLE.

Mr. DAWES, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain David Noble; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING MONEYS TO GEORGIA.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the same committee, reported a bill to refund to the State of Georgia certain moneys; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. From the title of the bill, the Chair is of opinion that it is not.

Mr. JACKSON. I can state the facts in relation to that bill in a few words.

The SPEAKER. A question of order is raised on it.

Mr. JACKSON. I wish to speak to the question of order. The object of this bill is to refund to the State of Georgia a sum of money paid by the act of the Legislature of Georgia, on a revolutionary claim. It is a private bill for the benefit of the State of Georgia, if there can be a private bill for the benefit of a State.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I thought that most of those cases, if not all of them, were settled and funded long and long ago.

Mr. JACKSON. I can state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this was not.

Mr. SEWARD. I think this is a different kind of claim altogether.

The SPEAKER. The precedents are various as to bills of this character, but the Chair is inclined to the opinion that this is not a private bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know certainly what the bill is, and I ask that it may be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the bill is not of such a private nature as entitles it to be reported this morning.

Mr. SEWARD. Upon the principle, I suppose, that a State cannot hold a private claim.

SAMUEL W. TURNER AND OTHERS.

Mr. HORTON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel W. Turner and Alvin A. Turner; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOB STAFFORD.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Job Stafford, of the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH M'BRIER.

Mr. AVERY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth McBrier, only surviving child and heir of Colonel Archibald Loughrey, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FLORENCE. I earnestly hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I cannot do it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Only half of the committees have reported. The desks of members are full of reports. I hope the motion will be voted down, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCALES and BLISS were appointed.

The House was divided; and the committee reported—ayes 69, noes 70.

So the motion was disagreed to.

JOHN B. HAND.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back an act (S. No. 136) for the relief of the heirs of John B. Hand, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

TREATIES WITH THE CHEROKEES.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 270) to execute the treaties of 1817 and 1819 with the Cherokees, by making provision for the reservations under the same, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS J. ASHBURY.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report on the memorial of Thomas J. Ashbury; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JESSE MORRISON.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of Jesse Morrison; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

M. M. MARMADUKE AND OTHERS.

Mr. WOODSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of M. M. Marmaduke and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompany report, ordered to be printed.

MAJOR JEREMIAH Y. DASHIELL.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back an act (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army, and asked that it be put on its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in settling the accounts of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army, to credit him in the sum of $23,115, that being the amount of public money accidentally lost by him on the 1st of May, 1857, in attempting to cross the bar of Indian river, Florida, for the purpose of paying the troops at Fort Capron, in that State.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope that that bill will not be put on its passage at this time. Let the committees be called on for reports, and this bill take its chance with all others.

Mr. QUITMAN. I feel it to be my duty, for public as well as private reasons, to press this bill. It is universally testified that this officer of the Army, when he had public money in custody, did his whole duty; yet he stands now in a state of quasi-suspension, in consequence of a deficit in his accounts. How this deficit occurred, the report will explain; and it will explain, too, that he is not in the least blamable. The paymaster, as well as the War Department, desires that he should be placed in active duty; and there is no reason why the bill should not be passed. I am sure that when the report is read, there can be no debate or objection to the bill. It has received the sanction of the Military Committee of this House and the Military Committee of the Senate. In the opinion of all, the reputation of this officer is enhanced by the strenuous exertions he made to save this public money. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to listen to the report.

The report was read. It states that the troops stationed on and near Indian river in Florida were in arrears of pay from two to six months in April, 1857; that Major Dashiell, in due performance of his duty as paymaster of the district, drew from the assistant treasurer at Charleston, South Carolina, $23,115, which was placed in a leather bag, ordinarily used by him for this purpose, and put in charge of an escort; that there were two routes by which to reach his place of destination, (Fort Capron, Florida,) one by sea, and the other (the river route) partly by land and partly by water; and that the latter route, owing to the shallowness of the water, as well as to certain outrages and massacres which had been lately perpetrated by the Indians in that vicinity, was considered not only unsafe, but impracticable. Major Dashiell, therefore took the only alternative, and proceeded by sea, in the schooner William and John, to the mouth of Indian river; arrived there, and acting under the advice of the captain of the vessel, who had six years' experience of the bar at the mouth of the river, he, with his son, proceeded to land. The bag containing the funds, which was duly identified by size, weight, and appearance, was lowered into the boat, being taken for that purpose from the iron safe in which it had been deposited. The bar, as appears from the officers of several vessels who were present, was in a favorable state for landing; and that it was so considered by Major Dashiell, appears from the fact that himself and son unhesitatingly accompanied the treasure in its transit to the shore.

It further appears that, while crossing the bar, the yawl boat which contained the party was suddenly capsized by a cross-breaker, and the bag containing the funds sunk. Major Dashiell, his son, and the crew, after clinging to the bottom of the boat for more than an hour, in imminent peril, were rescued by the boat of one of the vessels near by. Immediately after his rescue he applied for a guard to watch the spot, which was furnished by the commanding officer of the post, and took prompt and active measures to recover the money. A large reward was offered, and the most strenuous and constant endeavors made by the major and others to recover the treasure; but, owing to the high winds and heavy seas which then prevailed for several days, these attempts met with no success; and he was finally compelled, with reluctance, to abandon the search. The guard, however, remained, and the attempts to recover the funds were continued by the commanding officer of the post, but without a favorable result.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have but a few words to say upon this bill. The memorial came in at an early period of the session, and was promptly reported upon favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs. Subsequently, the bill now under consideration came in from the Senate.

The testimony establishes, beyond all dispute, the high character of this officer, and his importance and usefulness in his department, and also that this money was lost by an inevitable accident. The sole question for the House to determine is, whether a public officer, having in custody the funds of the United States, and losing them by an inevitable accident, shall be held responsible for the amount. I hope the bill will be passed, because the officer cannot return to his duty until it is passed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I must insist on my motion that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. I have no particular objection to the bill, but if we permit bills to be put upon their passage as soon as reported, we shall involve ourselves in difficulty.

Mr. QUITMAN. I hope not. What will be the consequence? The consequence will be that a valuable officer will be kept from the line of his duty at a period when we require the services of all public officers. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman to call the previous question. That will bring us to a direct vote.

Mr. QUITMAN. I call the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, was disagreed to—ayes 44, noes 81.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. QUITMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BREVET MAJOR DONALDSON.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, quartermaster United States Army; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATOR OF HORATIO BOULTBEE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the administrator of Horatio Boulton; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Angeline C. Bowman; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR BENJAMIN ALFORD.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate bill (No. 94) for the relief of Major Benjamin Alford, paymaster in the United States Army; it was laid on the table, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, presented an adverse report in the case of Benjamin D. Hyane; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. DODD.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William B. Dodd; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ELEAZER WILLIAMS.

Mr. PENDLETON also, from the same Committee, reported a bill for the relief of Eleazer Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. PENDLETON also, from the same committee, presented an adverse report on the memorial of F. W. Lander; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the same committee, also presented adverse reports on the memorial of Lieutenant J. C. McTuran, and of citizens of Iowa, offering a regiment of volunteers for Utah; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF WILLIAM B. DRAPER.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William B. Draper; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

DR. GEORGE H. HOWELL.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Dr. George H. Howell; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ENGINEERS OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of engineers in the United States Navy.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that a private bill?

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes. It is to relieve certain engineers. It is a private bill, general in its details.

The SPEAKER. The phraseology of the bill is that all engineers of the Navy of the United States, &c. The Chair thinks it is not a private bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. The Committee on Naval Affairs directed me to report it as a private bill. It is a law by which certain engineers are to receive certain allowances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is sorry to differ with the Committee on Naval Affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a private bill with public tendencies.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the Chair will do me the favor to read the second line of this bill he will see that it is a private bill. It is to allow certain engineers of the Navy for certain services.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it would be a very general law if it were passed.

Mr. FLORENCE. It would be if it were passed. But it is a private bill, notwithstanding. It is for the relief of certain engineers of the United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it cannot be received as a private bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I defer to the opinion of the Chair.

DRAPER AND HOLDEN.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Nehemiah S. Draper and William Holden, heirs-at-law of Mary Draper, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to give notice that when the Minnesota bill comes up I shall offer a substitute; and I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to have it printed for the convenience of members.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

HUBBELL'S EXPLOSIVE SHELL.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask that the papers and report in the case of Hubbell's explosive shell may be printed for the use of the committee. The papers are very voluminous, and it is almost impossible for the committee to consider them unless they are printed.

Mr. SEWARD. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is laboring under a slight misapprehension.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let the gentleman not attempt to correct me till he has heard what I have to say. I am such an exceedingly good natured sort of person that the floor has been twice taken from me to-day. The Committee on Naval Affairs directed me to ask that the House shall order the printing of these papers, and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is laboring under a very slight misapprehension about this matter. My understanding was that it was agreed that the question as to the printing of these documents should be postponed till the next meeting. It is a voluminous document, and I see no necessity, in the present aspect of the case, for having it printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what his specific motion is?

Mr. FLORENCE. The Committee on Naval Affairs directed me to report these papers to the House, and asked to have them printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] if that was his understanding of it? I certainly did not so understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. These papers were presented, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were taken up by the committee, but were found to be so voluminous that it was difficult to examine them, and it was suggested that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should rise in his place and ask permission to have them printed. I did not suppose that any report was to be made. I hope the request to print will be granted.

Mr. FLORENCE. Does the gentleman from Georgia want to raise a question of veracity between the gentleman from Ohio and myself? because, if he does, I will summon before this high tribunal the clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and perhaps I can bring up the record, too.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to understand the point. My understanding of the statement of the gentleman upon my left is, that the Committee on Naval Affairs desires that those papers shall be printed because they are so voluminous that the committee cannot examine the merits of the papers in their present shape. Is that so?

Mr. FLORENCE. It is.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I have no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the right conceded to him by the committee to make application here upon his own responsibility.

Mr. FLORENCE. I cannot hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not intend to raise a question of veracity between the gentlemen.

The papers were then ordered to be printed, and to be referred back to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports on the following petitions; which were severally laid on the table, and their reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of Nicholas Fooks;
The petition of Lucinda E. Cuerton;
The petition of George W. Whitten;
The petition of John Panghorn; and
The petition of Robert W. Caulk.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. JEWETT, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the respective petitions of Mary Ann Walker, Nathaniel Fadden, certain citizens of Pennsylvania for a homestead bill, Eliphalet Allen, and Joseph Bindeau, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; also, that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the respective petitions of Tillah Fox, Theophilus Taylor, and Thomas Brooks, and that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

ELIJAH CLOSE AND OTHERS.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were respectively read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Elijah Close, of Tennessee;

A bill granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee;

A bill granting an invalid pension to Conrad Schroeder;

A bill granting on invalid pension to Alexander S. Bean, of Tennessee; and

A bill for the relief of Michael A. Davenport, of Illinois.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. JEWETT, it was ordered that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sally Libby, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

Mr. JEWETT, from the same committee, reported back a bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JANE RANDOLPH.

Mr. JEWETT, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Jane Randolph; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. JEWETT, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed:

A bill extending the benefits of the pension laws to certain widows and orphans.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the same committee, reported a bill to continue the pension heretofore paid to Mary C. Hamilton, widow of Captain Fowler Hamilton, late of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. ROBBINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a collection district and port of entry at Tom's river, Ocean county, New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM BULLOCK AND OTHERS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of William Bullock;
A bill increasing a pension of Anthony Walter Bayard, of Bellefonte, in the State of Pennsylvania;

A bill for the relief of Wright Fore; and
A bill for the relief of Wyatt Griffith.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the following petitions; which were severally laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed:

On the petition of Francis Carver;
On the petition of George D. Dillon;
On the petition of George Wever;
On the petition of Robert Jones;
On the petition of Avery Stoddard;
On the petition of Nathaniel Dickenson, jr.;
On the petition of William Long;
On the petition of Bartholomew Clovis Renoix; and
On the petition of John Bonner.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Ruth B. Gardner, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

ROBINSON GAMMON AND OTHERS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Robinson Gammon;
A bill for the relief of Frederick Smith;
A bill for the relief of Phineas G. Pearson;
A bill for the relief of Judith Nott; and
A bill for the relief of John C. Rathbun.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the several petitions of Voucher Bonzinska and Ephraim Sharp; which were laid on the table, and the reports ordered to be printed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. CASE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of John Perry;
A bill for the relief of Ebenezer Hitchcock;

A bill for the relief of Shove Chase; and
A bill for the relief of Allan Smith.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CASE, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following cases; which were laid upon the table, and the reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of C. Melville Reeves;
The petition of Alexander Jones; and
The petition of William Johnson.

Mr. CASE, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed:

The petition of Daniel Morse;
The petition of Mary M. Carr;
The petition of James P. Bullock;
The petition of Daniel S. Chapman;
The petition of Richard W. Stockton;
The petition of William Israel;
The petition of Pliny Story;
The petition of Oliver Main; and
The petition of Terrence Kirby.

DOLLY BROWN.

On motion of Mr. CASE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Dolly Brown, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

DAVID WATSON.

Mr. FLORENCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of David Watson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to consider the bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the Senate bills upon the Speaker's table will be taken up and referred to the appropriate committees.

The SPEAKER. All except those which came here to-day were referred on yesterday; and those which came here to-day have not yet been journalized.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, in the chair.)

BARCLAY, LIVINGSTON, AND OTHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill before the committee for consideration is a bill (H. R. No. 204) to refund to Barclay, Livingston, and others, duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York, on the 19th day of July, 1845.

The bill provides that the collector of the customs of the port of New York, the naval officer of the said port, and the district attorney for the southern district of New York, be constituted a commission, without compensation, to ascertain the amount of duties paid upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, destroyed by fire in the city of New York, in unbroken and original packages, as imported, on the 19th of July, 1845, and the name or names and place or places of residence of the several parties entitled, as owners, or their legal representatives, to receive or have refunded to them the amount of the duties so paid upon the several parcels and packages of goods so destroyed, pursuant to the provisions of this act.

The bill then goes on to detail the manner and form in which these claims shall be adjudicated and paid.

Pending the reading of the bill,

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, said: Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this is a bill of a public rather than of a private character, and I move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. It is as clearly a private bill as any that is upon the Private Calendar. It is for the relief of certain individuals, of a specific and identical character. It does not include third persons.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the bill through, and then decide on the question.

The bill was read through

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not in favor of all creation, but it is in favor of all the importing merchants in all our cities, and is clearly as public a bill as any in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I understand private bills to be those which are in favor of persons who are named. It is true that this bill sets out by naming some persons, (one or two,) but it then goes on to provide relief for an indefinite number of persons not named in the bill. It is clearly a public bill; and I therefore move that it be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the first time that this bill has been here. It has been here ever since I have been in Congress, and I never before knew it to be considered in a Committee of the Whole House; it has always been considered as a public bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, it is very true that this bill has been before the House before this occasion, and it is quite as true that as often as it has been before this House so often has it been passed by this House; and, if my information is correct, as often as it has been presented to the House it has been considered in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. So much, therefore, for authority and precedent. In respect to the objection upon principle which the gentleman makes, it is simply specious and plausible, with no foundation in reality. That gentlemen may belong to a general class of business men is no obstacle to their being considered private individuals. Will the gentleman pretend to argue here that because he is one of a public body therefore he is in no sense a private individual, and that he has no private relations? And if he cannot and does not, can he argue that because these gentlemen—importing merchants of New York—are individuals of a class, and as individuals of a class come here for relief, they must, therefore, be public characters; as public as the class to which they belong?

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. According to the gentleman's argument, then, the bill granting pensions to certain officers and soldiers in the war of the Revolution, and the bounty land bill, would have been private bills. They provide for a class of persons just as this bill does. These men belong to the class of importing merchants. The distinction I make is, that a private bill must contain the names of the persons who are to be benefited by it. This bill does no such thing. It refers to a class, merely.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. This bill names, distinctly and specifically, the persons to be relieved. Certain memorialists present their petition. A bill is introduced for their relief, and for the relief of no person else.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Allow me to cite a precedent. In the case of Staples, and others, three individuals who had suffered from the destruction of their property by fire, were permitted to join in one bill. That was in 1852, and there are various bills of the same kind.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. So I have understood the precedents to have been all through the proceedings of Congress, from 1790 down to the present time. Such bills have always been considered in this manner, and as applications for relief by private individuals. And, sir, if we are to draw a line of distinction here upon a hypothesis of this kind, you must obliterate the whole line of distinction, and consider that every gentleman who comes with his associates before this House and claims relief, because he belongs to a guild, a profession, or trade, must therefore, forsooth, be considered as covered with the publicity of that guild, profession, or trade, and consequently not empowered to ask for relief from a Committee of the Whole House. Sir, there is no reason in such an argument as this. On the contrary, if pursued to its end, it must resolve itself and us in an absurdity.

I have but one more word to say in reference to the remarks of my friend who has made this motion, and it is simply that the papers indicate who the relief is for, and why it is asked. These papers indicate specifically the names of the individuals; and because some fifty, sixty, or seventy individuals—and they private individuals—come here for private relief, it is none the less a private matter because they are multiplied by numerals, and none the less private because the names of one, or two, or three, or more, are here to designate them. Sir, there is nothing in the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina. The precedents are with us, and I hope the question will be taken.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Maine certainly did not understand my position. The precedents they cite have no bearing on the point. They cite specific cases where two or three persons are mentioned in one bill. The objection to this bill is, that it does not name the persons at all. The gentleman from New York says that they are named in the memorial. That may be true, but they are not named in the bill; only two persons are named in the bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman is mistaken, if he inclines to the belief that in my argument I yielded the point that the individuals are not named in the bill. I meant to be understood that they are specifically named in the bill, "Barclay, Livingston, and others."

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. "Others" is a very indefinite expression. It is like the word "sundries" in a merchant's bill, and may mean anything or nothing. That is the objection which the gentleman does not seem to have understood, or at any rate, he has not met it fairly and squarely. It is very true that private bills may have been passed in which two, three, or fifty persons have been named, but they must be named in the bill. But this bill merely says "Barclay, Livingston, and others," thus applying to an indefinite number of persons, and making it a public bill.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. This bill is made very definite by the language employed. It reads:

"To ascertain the amount of duties paid upon all goods, wares, and merchandise destroyed by fire in the city of New York, in unbroken and original packages, as imported, on the 19th day of July, 1845."

Now, every man who had goods destroyed by fire in that port in unbroken packages on that day is included in this bill, and no other persons. Two of those persons were Messrs. Barclay and Livingston, and the others referred to are those similarly situated, owning unbroken packages as private property on that day, and which packages were consumed by fire on that day. The language of the bill makes it apply to a class of persons, definite in their character, who owned goods in unbroken packages on a given day in the city of New York.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] is undoubtedly right in regard to the character of this bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will all this discussion be taken out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from New York had yielded the floor.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. No, I have not yielded it. I shall insist on opening the discussion on the merits of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman will proceed. The Chair supposed he had yielded the floor.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. It has been occupied by two or three persons since the gentleman spoke.

Mr. STANTON. Do I understand that the gentleman from New York claims the floor?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do.

Mr. STANTON. I would be glad to know upon what theory?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Upon the theory of a position upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] took the floor, submitted a motion, and made a speech upon it. The gentleman from New York replied; and then his colleague [Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE] spoke. I had no idea I was occupying the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to have yielded the floor, and assigned it to the gentleman from Ohio in the preliminary discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My recollection is, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] made a speech, and concluded by saying that he had nothing more to say at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] is not in order at this time. He has no right to move that the committee rise and report the bill—no matter for what purpose—until it has been read through by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina is, that the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if there is a report in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let the report be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to state the reasons of my appeal.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to debate, unless it be in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] raised the point of order that the bill was not properly before the committee, and the Chair overruled the point of order. If the gentleman from North Carolina had supposed that that decision was erroneous, he could have taken an appeal, and tried to have the decision reversed. Then the question would have been whether the bill should not go, under the rule, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It seems to me that, by the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the gentleman could have attained his object. But it strikes me as very clear that it is not competent for him to move that the committee rise, and report the bill back to the House, while the bill is before the committee, to be read, section by section, and while it is open to amendment and debate. Otherwise, it strikes me that a new way has just been discovered by which, under the form of moving that the committee rise, with a recommendation of a certain kind, we would be deprived of all right to discuss or to amend the bill. Thus, when it is wanted to cut off debate on any question before a Committee of the Whole House, all you have to do is to make a motion that the committee rise, with a recommendation that it be referred to some other committee, and then, once in the House, the previous question can be called, and the bill put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is very clear to me that the gentleman from Maine is wrong in his question of order, and wrong in his appeal; and that the Chair is right in its decision. The gentleman from North Carolina, or any other gentleman, had a right to move that the committee rise and report this bill. That motion does not preclude debate or amendment, and therefore it is perfectly in order, and the committee can go on and have the bill read through and perfected; and when that is done, then the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, being in abeyance, may be put, as I understand the practice of the House, and in that view of it, I think the appeal from the decision of the Chair should not be overruled.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Very well; I withdraw my appeal, if that be the understanding of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the bill be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that that motion is based upon the idea that this is a public bill; and that is a question for the Chair to settle.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no right to decide that question. The bill has been referred to the committee, and it is for the committee to say what shall be done with it. It is not for the Chair to say whether it is of a private or a public nature.

Mr. HOUSTON. The question should be then submitted to the committee whether this is a public or a private bill; and if it be properly on the Private Calendar then it comes up for debate and amendment. On the question now pending before the committee and the Chair the merits of the bill cannot be very well—probably not at all—debated. The merits of the bill cannot be debated on a proposition to report it back to the House, because it is improperly here. If the committee determine that it is properly here, then it is open for debate and amendment; but not until that question is determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be allowed to state that the bill is now debatable, and open for amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. How can that be, if the question is pending to report it back because of its being improperly on this Calendar? That is the question now, and it is not in order to debate the bill. If the committee determine that it is a public bill it must be referred to another committee, and placed upon another Calendar. And that being so, it seems to me that the merits of the bill are not now open for debate. I present that question of order, that we ought to first vote on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to determine whether we will retain the bill in this committee and on this Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order. The question is, "Shall the bill be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to another committee?" and on that question the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] has the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I would like to understand the question. It seems to me that the bill is here by the action of the House. Two or three times this morning, while the House was in session, the Speaker refused to allow bills to be introduced because they were public bills. The Speaker decided the question, and gave them the proper directions. And so this question has been before the House, and has been referred, as a private bill, to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. Now we are called upon to go back to the House, and ask the House to review its decision, and to give this bill a different direction. I have no interest in this bill; but we must have more uniformity in legislation. If, therefore, the gentleman from North Carolina thought his objection was valid, he should have made it when the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House. That was the time for him to move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the ground of its being a public bill. It was not done; and the action of the House was had; and the bill referred to a Committee of the Whole House. And now we are called upon to revise the action of the House. Why, sir, the House itself, when in session, went so far as to determine that it could not overrule questions of order settled in committee.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have before referred to the fact that the substance of the application contained in this memorial has been responded to by various bills which have frequently been before this House at former sessions. The fire through which this loss was experienced occurred in 1845. In 1848, during the Thirtieth Congress, a bill similar to the one under discussion now, was presented to, and passed by, the House, but at too late a day to be reached by the Senate. In 1850, at the Thirty-First Congress, a bill of a similar character was reported by the Committee on Commerce, but it was not reached by the House. In 1852, and in 1854, there was similar action, with the same result. In 1856, a bill similar to the one which is now before us, was passed by the Senate and sent down to the House. The House passed it with an amendment and sent it back to the Senate, where, in consequence of a pressure of business, it was not acted on.

Now, sir, in reference to the facts upon which this bill moves, I will simply, and briefly as possible, present them to the committee. On the 19th of July, 1845, as I stated, an extensive fire occurred in the city of New York. Property, both real and personal, to the amount of some five or six million dollars was consumed. Among other property that then perished, there was merchandise. On that merchandise there had been paid to the Government, in duties, $600,000. That part of the merchandise represented by $200,000 of duties, was in broken packages. No claim has been made on the Government by the merchants who represented that portion of the property. It is only in reference to the duties paid on those packages which were destroyed upon that occasion in an unbroken condition that a claim is now made, and in reference to which the bill before the committee is framed. The amount of those duties is $400,000; and of the merchandise represented by that sum, nearly the whole had been entered by the owners or importers with the right, under the then existing law, at any time within three years thereafter, upon application made to the collector at the custom-house, to be repaid the duties paid thereon, upon an exportation of the same. But the fire occurred; and by reason of that accident it was that the right was interrupted and arrested. And now, because that right was thus interrupted, have not these gentlemen—who, if no such accident had intervened, would have possessed a continuing three years' claim upon the Government for the return of those duties, upon intimation that they wished to export their goods—the right to demand of the Government that the money it received from them without consideration shall be restored? in other words, that they shall be compensated to the extent of the benefit conferred by them upon the Government of the United States?

Some one hundred and nine thousand dollars of these duties represent liquors that had been previously imported into the United States. Those liquors, as the law then existed, were obliged to be placed in cellars under the surveyor of the port, and could not be legally conveyed to the private warehouses of the merchants. The warehouse act of 1846 provided public warehouses from the date of its passage for every species of merchandise, in addition to liquors. The general relief law of 1854 was, therefore, directed to the then existing revenue system, which compelled all merchandise, without exception, to be placed in public or bonded warehouses, until delivered for consumption or exportation; and was not intended to reach cases that had occurred previous to the warehouse act; but because liquors were obliged, before the passage of this act, to be deposited in public cellars, its letter and spirit included these; and thus was it that a law, not intended to retroact beyond 1846, reached over to 1845, and restored by its remedial relief $109,000 of duties paid upon liquors destroyed by the fire of 1845; the same fire in which other merchandise was destroyed, the duties paid on which were $300,000.

The act of 1854 recognized the principle that the merchant whose property has been imported, and on which the appropriate duties have been paid, is entitled to a return of those duties, if the importation has not gone into the consumption of the country. That act, proceeding upon this principle, overtook a portion of this $400,000 of duties, and returned $109,000 thereof to the merchant importers; and they now claim that the balance of nearly three hundred thousand dollars should follow the same direction.

Sir, to proceed no further with the argument, but to rely upon precedent and upon the laws of the country, these gentlemen, the beneficiaries under the bill, might rest content with the simple declaration that gentlemen cannot, without multiplying their acts upon a record not yet obliterated, say that that which is claimed as compensation shall not be granted as a right.

Some of the goods on which these duties were paid had been imported not one month previous to the 19th of July, the time when the fire occurred. Some of them had been imported not one week before. Some of them, even on the very day previous to the fire, had been unladen from the ships at the wharf, and deposited where, by the then law they should be deposited, in the warehouses of the merchants. In this connection, I beg to all the attention of the committee to an extract from a letter from one of the claimants here, and an expectant beneficiary under this bill. It is from Hutchinson and Tiffany, one of the importing firms of the city of New York. They say:

"We had imported one hundred and sixteen bales of goods, and paid $8,000 duties thereon. Nine days afterwards the fire consumed them, still being in the unbroken packages. We, knowing them to be very salable goods, and believing we should soon be refunded the duties, immediately ordered a similar invoice in amount and quality; and just eighty three days after the fire, those goods arrived in New York, were entered at the custom-house, and $8,000 in duties paid thereon."

I might instance other cases, but it is unnecessary to do so. I offer this as an illustration of the relative positions of the importers—owners of this merchandise—and the Government, which was profiting by the duties they had paid. The merchandise had not gone into consumption, yet the Government had received the duties thereon upon the principle alone which sustains these taxes upon merchandise, namely, that they have entered into the consumption of the country.

Now, sir, in respect to the claimants who apply, I will not detain the committee long upon this point. It is simple, and may be unfolded in a very few words. In the first place, we have the memorial of the merchants in 1850, the memorial of the merchants in 1853, and the memorial of the merchants in 1857. Again, we have, in 1848, the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York; and in 1856, we have the resolutions of the same body. All these papers, which lie before me, are referred to as evidence that the gentlemen who suffered by reason of this fire, forthwith, through public bodies and by their own immediate agencies and instrumentalities, applied for the relief which they supposed the law would afford them. I will detain the committee but a very few moments in directing their attention to the substance of these memorials.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I would like to inquire of my colleague whether, under the act of March, 1854, these parties could not obtain relief?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. As I said before, not in respect to duties paid on merchandise that is not comprehended within the designation of "liquors." The duties of that part of the merchandise which was liquor, have been refunded under the act of 1854; but in respect to the balance, namely, $300,000, speaking in round numbers, there has been no relief under that act. But all the merchandise—whether liquors, dry goods, or whatever else it may have been—upon which duties had been paid, was in the same category of right under which its owners came here for relief.

As I was saying when I was interrupted, I will direct the attention of the committee, in brief, to the language of those public bodies which have applied by memorial for the relief demanded. Said the Chamber of Commerce in New York in 1856:

Whereas, it appears by recent proceedings and debates in the House of Representatives of the United States, upon a bill to remit duties paid on goods destroyed by fire in the original and unbroken packages as imported, that erroneous statements have been made prejudicial to the bill, and therefore endangering its passage; and whereas, the principal benefits to accrue from said bill will inure to the business community of this city, the large majority of the claimants being sufferers by the fire which occurred in this city in July, 1845, which involved a loss, including buildings and property of every description, of about five million dollars; and whereas, from the best information laid before us and obtainable, it appears that the aggregate of the claims for the return of the duties on goods so destroyed in their original and unbroken packages never exceeded the sum of about four hundred thousand dollars; and whereas, the claims still remain in the hands of the merchants, the sufferers, and original claimants, or the insurance companies, to the extent of the insurance paid: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, That the delegation in Congress from the State of New York, and especially those representing this city, be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to use every effort to secure the passage of a bill for the refunding the duties paid on goods destroyed, as before recited, and to repel, as incorrect, any statement conflicting with the facts as set forth in the preamble to this resolution.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be transmitted to each of the Representatives in Congress from this city, and to each of the Senators from the State of New York.

Adopted at a special meeting held July 14, 1856.

By order of the Chamber. P. PERIT, President.

EDWARD C. BOGERT, Secretary.

Mr. KELLY. What evidence has my colleague that the Chamber of Commerce is in possession of the facts there stated?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. All the evidence I have is this paper, signed by the president and secretary of the Chamber, and attested by its seal, reciting these facts; and I believe that that which they say they know to be true is true.

Mr. KELLY. Does my colleague know whether they ever took any evidence in this case or not?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have no knowledge of the action of the Chamber of Commerce upon this or any other subject; but I receive their certificate, regarding its asseverations as true.

Mr. KELLY. Does the gentleman regard anything emanating from the Chamber of Commerce, whether substantiated by evidence or not, as proof which is to guide him in his action in this House?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. In reply to my colleague I respectfully say, that I most assuredly and unequivocally would, provided that I was satisfied that the Chamber of Commerce, or those who compose it, had had an opportunity of learning and examining a subject which so nearly concerns them, and with which they are so intimately connected as that relating to the amount of dutiable merchandise imported into the city of New York.

Mr. KELLY. What evidence has my colleague that these claims are now in the hands of those who were originally entitled to them?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I was coming to that point; but because my colleague has asked me the question, I will reverse the order of my remarks in that respect, and answer his inquiry here. The evidence which I have is furnished by a paper signed by importers of New York, and which I will now read. It is as follows:

The undersigned, importing merchants of the city of New York, interested in a return of the duties paid by us on goods destroyed by fire in this city on the 19th July, 1845, observe with regret the erroneous statements of the amount of our claims, and the other causes which have interposed to delay the return of said duties, and beg leave to state:

That we have not parted with our claims, nor are we aware that any of the original claimants have sold or assigned any of said claims.

The amount of the original claims was, as near as we can ascertain, about $400,000. This sum has been materially reduced by a partial return on liquors, under a subsequent construction of the Department, and will be still further reduced by the exclusion of insured goods and insurance companies, as provided for in the bill now before the House of Representatives.

The aggregate of the claims for the port of New York, should that bill become a law, will not exceed, in our opinion, $300,000.

We respectfully urge upon the delegation in the House of Representatives from this city, and upon Congress, the propriety of our claims, and earnestly ask the passage of a law for our relief.

New York, May 7, 1856.

Mr. HOARD. I desire to ask my colleague, whether these goods were in the possession of the Government, or were in the merchants' stores at the time they were destroyed?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. In answer to the inquiry of my colleague, I reply, they were not in the possession of the Government. They were not in Government warehouses; for at that time the warehousing system did not exist. The warehousing act went into operation in 1846; and this fire occurred in July, 1845. But although they were in the local possession of the merchants—within their private warehouses—yet constructively, they were in the possession of the Government. They were in unbroken packages, and the Government had still a right and contingent claim upon them. These proceeded from a possible duty to be performed in future by its officers, in constructive joint possession with the importer; for, as I stated before, under the law, the merchant having the unbroken package in his warehouse, had the right, at any time within three years after importation, to claim from the Government a return of duty, or debenture, on exporting what he had previously imported.

Thus much for the inquiry of my colleague, [Mr. HOARD.] Now in reply to the inquiry of my friend and colleague, [Mr. KELLY.] Suppose, sir, that these claims do not continue in the hands of the original claimants; suppose that these importers had been ruined by that fire; suppose that this Government, thrusting its arm into their pockets, and retaining what did not belong to it, and to which it had no more claim than the highwayman has to the property which he seizes under his "stand and deliver;" these men, thus suffering, had been reduced to poverty, and parted with their claims: is that any reason why this Government should not make the wrong right? Is it any reason why gentlemen should stand here and say, "we have had your property, and having enjoyed its use now for thirteen years, principal and interest—having rolled up from $600,000 to $1,100,000—we refuse your prayer for relief?" Or, sir, are gentlemen to be justified in the position, because poverty may have overtaken these men, or because they may have believed the Government unjust, and that it would not refund these duties paid, and therefore parted with their claims, that the wrong shall not be remedied, and that the right shall continue to be oppressed? I claim no favor for this bill, but I demand that you do justice. I ask no man to vote for the bill who would not be ashamed if he voted against it.

I have not yet arrived at the end of the discussion of this question, but I trust that even the doubters will be satisfied, at last, that the facts contended for are amply sustained by the evidence and supported by law. Sir, I have stated before, that the principle on which we come before Congress and ask it to do justice in the premises is, that the goods on which these duties were paid had not entered into the consumption of the country. I also referred to the legal principle that assessments and taxes, as duties, have always been imposed upon merchandise in reference to the fact that it has entered into the consumption of a nation, thus conducing to its general welfare. That this is so, I cite to you the remarks of Judge Woodbury, which constitute the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Brune vs. Marriot, collector of Baltimore, (9 Howard's Reports, page 619.) Mr. Justice Woodbury, in that case, says:

"We have no right to assess here what does not exist here. The collection of revenue on an article not existing would be an anomaly; a mere fiction of law is not to be countenanced nor required to enforce just rights."

"Where a portion of shipment does not arrive, it cannot be taxed on any ground of law, or truth and propriety. Such is the case of a portion being lost at sea, thrown overboard, or when consumed by fire or natural decay—natural or artificial causes; in either case it cannot be assessed."

Here you have the law of the supreme judicial tribunal of the United States. If gentlemen wish to sit here, intending to review that decision; if they wish to sit here for the purpose of questioning the judicial authority of our highest legal tribunal, they may do so; but they will do it without argument, and only when deserted by reason.

The court in that case proceeds further to say: "To add to such unfortunate losses the burden of a duty would be an uncalled for aggravation; would be adding cruelty to misfortune, and not justified by any sound reason. Duties should not be exacted on what is lost, much less on what never entered into the use of the community."—Ibid, page 634.

I direct the attention of gentlemen to this point; and if there be no other reason—and there are fifty others—this should dispose of the question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Certainly.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have looked into that case in Howard, and it seems to me that the point the gentleman now assumes is untenable under the principle of that case. The position taken by the court was, that it was not competent to tax an article which did not exist. If I understand this case, these goods were delivered over to the merchants—they were in their hands; and they cannot come before this body, and take advantage of their own negligence. It was their duty to insure. [A Voice. "They did insure."] Very well; the insurance companies cannot come before Congress under the guise of these original parties, and claim from Congress what they were not entitled to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. There was a further duty which the gentleman might have enumerated in his catalogue of duties, which duty would perhaps have been as obligatory as those which he has mentioned, namely: that it should have been the duty of the fire not to have burned; that the owner should have so stored his property that it could not possibly have suffered. Now, if the gentleman can show that there was a neglect upon the part of the importers, I will yield the whole argument. But when the property is stored where the Government directs it to be stored, and is carefully kept there until destroyed by act of God, will the gentleman from Virginia rise in his place, and say that it was the duty of the merchant to forbid the advance of the fire? The gentleman mistakes altogether, although he has looked into the case I cited, the whole scope and bearing of the opinion; for the court puts its decision not upon the ground that duties cannot be levied upon what does not exist, but upon the ground that duties cannot be exacted upon a portion being lost at sea, thrown overboard, or when consumed by fire or natural decay. Does the gentleman feel the force of that fire—a consuming fire that destroys the position of the gentleman from Virginia, as the fire of 1845 destroyed the goods for the duties on which we come here and ask to be repaid? What has the gentleman to say?

Mr. CLEMENS. I put it to the gentleman whether there is not a period of time at which this transcendental duty, upon which he now argues, must commence?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Yes, sir; at the time of payment.

Mr. CLEMENS. In this case the duties were paid, the goods delivered over to the parties; and there is no provision of law which makes the Government liable. The parties now come here and make a claim for an inevitable accident. The gentleman asks me whether the Government could not have ordered the fire not to burn? It seems to me that is a refinement of logic in which I cannot be expected to follow the gentleman at all. There is a point of time at which this liability, if at all, must commence. How long was it after these duties were paid that this fire occurred? In some cases I understand it was six or seven weeks, and in some cases not a week. At what time will you commence the liability of this Government? If under an act of this kind you hold the Government responsible, without reference to the time, you see the danger which will arise in reference to all acts in the future. In that view I put the question to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman announces that he is unable to follow me. From the high point of my position I look down upon his argument and answer it thus: that, from the moment I receive my neighbor's property without compensation, nearly all the honest men in creation think there is a liability upon me, who has taken his money, to restore it. I, therefore, from my elevation of argument, looking down upon the gentleman's clouded position, answer him, that, from the moment the Government takes the duty upon merchandise which never enters into the consumption of the United States, Government becomes liable, in law and equity, to repay that which it had wrongfully exacted.

I hasten to the remainder of what I have to say; and as I proceed with the argument upon the question, gentlemen will perceive that the demand I make cannot be evaded. The Government must say, either that it will retain the money it received as duties, or that it will return it, having had the benefit of nearly five hundred thousand dollars of interest in the mean time—a period of about thirteen years.

Mr. FENTON. I wish to make an inquiry in the way of reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS.] I will ask my colleague whether it is not true that, from 1842 to 1845, the Government required from the importer payment of duties, and the possession of his goods imported, inasmuch as no public stores or warehouses were provided by the Government, except some cellars in which imported liquors were deposited? and whether the importers were not allowed thirty-six months for reexportation and the refunding of duties on goods then imported, and upon which duties had been paid?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I answer in the affirmative; and I think I have already so stated in my preceding remarks. I will now read further from the authority to which I have referred:

"But as Congress wishes to foster an honest and honorable commerce by its laws, no less than obtain revenue, it is neither the true policy nor right of departments or of courts, nor is it presumed to be their desire, to embarrass mercantile business, when not attended by equivocation or fraud, or to throw doubts and difficulties over the liberal course proper to be pursued towards the community in any branch of trade."—Ibid., page 635.

"Thinking, as the court does, that this is the more liberal and reasonable course, it has our full approbation; and it is now ordered and adjudged by this court, that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed with costs and damages at six per centum."

This opinion was given on an appeal by the Treasury Department from the decision of the lower court, that duties could only be assessed on what actually arrived in the country and entered into consumption. The justice and equity of this decision induced a general law to meet future cases—that of 23d March, 1854.

I will refer now to the legislative precedents in point; and, as I am restricted in time, I will accompany them with but a very brief commentary. I will refer to them seriatim.

Congress, as I have said, has repeatedly refunded duties on the principle of this case. The instances are as follows:

1. January 14, 1790. Congress remitted duties on a quantity of hemp, duck, molasses, &c., destroyed by fire while on the voyage to the port of delivery, after the duties had been paid. (See 6 United States Statutes, page 2.)

2. August 4, 1790. An act remitting duties on salt destroyed by flood while stored at Annapolis. (See 6 United States Statutes, page 3.)

3. May 9, 1794. An act refunding duties paid on coffee imported into Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, and subsequently destroyed by fire. (See 6 United States Statutes, page 15.)

This last is a case within the knowledge, perhaps, of gentlemen from Virginia, and I suppose, also, of my friend who interrogated me.

4. March 3, 1801. An act directing the collector of Providence, Rhode Island, to remit the duties on certain teas destroyed by fire. (See 6 United States Statutes, page 44.)

Numerous other acts of Congress might be cited, remitting and refunding duties where the goods were destroyed in whole or in part by fire, viz: act of March 7, 1794; June 1, 1796; March 3, 1797; and so onward, in numerous cases, in the years 1798, 1801, &c., &c., down to the great fire in New York, in 1835.

The act of July 7, 1839, granting relief on account of the great fire of 1835, was almost identical with the bill now reported by the committee.

This bill, if differing at all, is more stringent in its provisions; and under it there is no possibility of a claim being allowed for which there is not good proof.

Congress passed similar acts in 1849, 1850, 1852, and 1853.

Thus Congress, by repeated acts, has established the principle of remitting or refunding duties on goods destroyed by fire, commencing with the act of 1790, and coming down to the act of 1853.

We come now to the act of the 28th of March, 1854, but I have enlarged on that already so fully that I will not detain the committee at this time by further reference to it.

Mr. Chairman, not only has the principle been recognized by this Government in the adjudication of our courts and elsewhere, but it is a principle which has been recognized wherever commerce is known and is applied, wherever civilization and courts of law have an existence. In proof of this, I refer to the following certificates:

Russia.

Boston, December 10, 1849.

The subscribers, merchants of the city of Boston and its vicinity, have been in the habit of making shipments of various kinds of goods and merchandise to St. Petersburg, Russia; that some of us have had goods, sugars, &c., destroyed and damaged by water, fire or otherwise, and in such cases, the whole duties have been remitted on the articles wholly destroyed, a small duty charged on the merchandise damaged, and a lessened duty charged on such as were saved from damage; and also certify that it is the custom of the Russian Government, as far as we know or are concerned, to remit all duties (on goods destroyed) to the importer, assignee, or to the party that would be injured by the exaction of duty; nor do we know of any nation in Europe that charges duty on goods or merchandise, unless the merchandise is consumed by the people.

William Savage, James Harris, Samuel Quincy, Richard Soule, Benjamin Rich.

LIVERPOOL, November 20, 1848.

We, the undersigned, merchants and brokers of the town of Liverpool, do hereby certify, that it is usual for the British Government to remit the duties on goods of any description, destroyed by fire, or other casualties, on being petitioned to that effect by the proprietors, upon the principle that the goods so destroyed cannot be delivered for consumption.

LONDON, November 29, 1848.

We, the undersigned, merchants of the city of London, hereby certify, that in all cases where goods or merchandise are destroyed by fire or other accidents, it is the practice of the British Government to release the owners of such goods from all bonds or payments of duties, upon the principle that goods so destroyed are not taken into consumption.

In the above list of names, there are some whose signatures I recognize, and who belong to some of the wealthiest and most respectable firms in London.

GEO. BANCROFT.

Extract of a letter dated London, February 11, 1848, received from Messrs. Quarles, Harris & Sons.

"We are happy to see that so very just and proper a measure as the repayment of the duties on wines and other merchandise destroyed by fire is before Congress, and we sincerely hope it may be carried, as the reciprocity of national conventions is a very important point, and bears upon all such matters very strongly.

"We deem it right to point out to you, that you may notice it in the proper quarters, that had the property belonging to American citizens been destroyed here by fire, by falling in of vaults or arches, or by any other accident, the duties would not have been levied, or, if paid, refunded."

France.

NEW YORK, October 19, 1850.

The subscribers having been engaged in the importation of goods from France, and the exportation of cotton and other products of the United States to France, do hereby certify, that the French Government does not levy duties on foreign merchandise, unless consumed by its citizens; that if such foreign merchandise as imported is consumed by fire or destroyed, the said duties, if paid, are returned by the Government to the importer, or to any party or parties that would be damaged if the Government retained such duties. BOSTON, December 12, 1849.

The undersigned, a merchant of the city of Boston, during his course of business, has been in the habit of making shipments to Russia, and that in the year 1834, he had a shipment of sugars destroyed and damaged by an inundation; that the Russian Government remitted the duties on the articles wholly damaged, and a lesser duty on such as were only partly damaged.

ROB. G. SHAW.

BOSTON, December 17, 1849.

The undersigned, of Dorchester, in the State of Massachusetts, and formerly interested in the shipping interest between this country and Russia, has been in the habit of making shipments of various kinds of merchandise to St. Petersburg—and that I am knowing to the Russian Government making allowance and returning the duties on goods and merchandise destroyed and damaged by water, fire, or otherwise, at some periods; and I believe it is the custom of most of the European nations, that charge duties on goods and merchandise, to remit the duties on such as are destroyed that is not consumed by the people.

JOHN D'WOLF.

Thus, sir, the usage and law, not only of this but of other countries, acknowledge this principle and enforce it.

I have now presented all the facts and considerations applicable to this bill, and it would be useless for me to enlarge upon them further than I have done. I will make reference now to the character of the bill. It provides for the establishment of a board of commissioners, to consist of the collector of customs at the port of New York, the naval officer of that port, and the district attorney for the southern district of New York. These are to examine and to report upon claims presented; and if a claim be not presented within six months after the passage of the act, it will not be entitled to be received or examined. Section three provides:

"That as soon as the said commissioners shall have finally closed the taking of the testimony in relation to any one or more claims, they shall cause to be made a full and perfect statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise, proved in said claim, or claims, to their satisfaction, to have been destroyed at the conflagration aforesaid, in the unbroken and original packages in which the same were imported, designating in such statement the number of packages, the dutiable value of each, the rate and amount of duty on each, and the name of the person or persons entitled to receive or have refunded to him or them the duties paid upon each package, or required to be paid on each package, and the fact whether such duty has been paid or remains unpaid or secured, and shall report whether any and what part of the merchandise so destroyed was insured, and if insured, whether any such insurance has been paid, or is secured to be paid; and if so paid or secured, they shall deduct from the certificate to be granted under the provisions of this act a sum which will bear the same proportion to the whole duties paid as the amount of said insurance bears to the whole value of said merchandise; and the commissioners shall cause three fair copies of such statement to be made and certified by themselves to be the true and correct results of their investigations: one of which copies they shall file with the collector of the customs for the port of New York; another with the naval officer of the said port; and the third, together with the testimony taken before the said commissioners, they shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be by him kept on file in his Department: Provided, That no commissioner herein named shall participate in said statement who did not sit upon the examination of the claim and hear all the proof.

It is then provided "that these proceedings shall be communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval or disapproval." In case he disapproves, and the district attorney shall certify that, because of new facts discovered, a reëxamination will subserve the ends of justice, then a reëxamination may be ordered, and the papers shall, it is provided, be again sent to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval or disapproval.

Again, sir, in section six, it is provided:

"That, upon the presentation to the collector of the port of New York by, or on behalf of, any legal holder thereof of any certificate so issued by the said commissioners, the said collector shall receive such certificate in lieu of money for the payment of duties, at all times indorsing upon the certificate the amount of duties thus paid by its presentation; and as fast as said certificates shall be thus fully canceled, the said collector shall retain and transmit them to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be by him placed on the files of his Department, with the statement upon which they were issued and the testimony upon which the duties are refunded; and the amount of said certificates so transmitted shall be credited to said collector in his accounts with the Treasury Department."

So, sir, you will see that this is not a bill for refunding in specie duties that have been received; but for granting certificates of the amounts of duties to be refunded, which certificates may be used in the discharge of debts for duties incurred thereafter by those holding the certificates to the Government.

At the proper time, I shall offer the following amendment as section seven:

And he it further enacted, That any and all false swearing under this act, when falling under the definition of perjury as adjudicated by the Federal courts, be, and the same is hereby, made felony, punishable according to the laws providing for that offense."

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Chairman, I desire for a very few moments to notice some of the points which have been made by the gentleman who has just closed his remarks. On reference to the authorities referred to in the report of the committee, as well as to the special acts cited here, I find that the argument of the gentleman is not sustainable. The case referred to in volume nine of Howard's Supreme Court Reports, page 619, is not the case as put by the gentleman from New York. It is a case arising out of a leakage of sugar and molasses, and the reduction of duties was made because the leakage took place before the goods arrived; and in addition to that fact, the duties were paid under protest. What does the court decide? They say:

"By the eleventh section of the act of Congress passed on the 30th of July, 1846, (Statutes at Large, pamphlet, page 46,) the duties upon imported sugar are fixed at thirty per cent. ad valorem.

"The true construction of the law is, that the duty should be charged only upon that quantity of sugar and molasses which arrives in our ports, and not upon the quantity which appears by the invoice to have been shipped, an allowance being proper for leakage.

"The proviso in the eighth section, namely, 'that under no circumstances shall the duty be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice value,' is not in hostility with the above construction, because the proviso refers only to the price, and not to the quantity. A protest made after the payment of the duties charged, and after the case had been closed up, will not enable a party to recover back the money from the collector; but if the protest be made in a single case, with a design to include subsequent cases, and the money remains in the hands of the collector, without being paid into the Treasury, and it was so understood by all parties, such a protest will entitle the importer to recover the money from the collector."

Now, sir, the case, as stated in the report of the committee, is not properly put. The court decided no such thing as the gentleman has stated. What Chief Justice Woodbury did decide was this: that where in any case the rates of duties were fixed by law, and something occurred to those goods, by inevitable accident, before they arrived in port, then there ought to be a corresponding reduction in the rates of duties. But in this case the goods had arrived at the port of New York.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman from Virginia will allow me to interrupt him at this point, and I do it not for the purpose of embarrassing him, but of setting him right, and the committee right, in respect to the position which I have taken. He does not deny, nor can he, that the paragraphs which I have read are to be found in the opinion of the court. The point to which the gentleman alludes is a technical one, and it is simply this: that if accidents have occurred before the duties are paid, and the duties be not paid under protest, the want of a protest is a technical defense to the claim in a court of law. But this is a case in which the goods were received, the duties paid, and the accident occurred after the payment of the duties, but before the goods had gone into general consumption. The point upon which this case rests is, that because the goods had not gone into consumption, therefore, the duties ought to be restored.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have not the slightest disposition to overstate the case, or to take any advantage of the gentleman in the argument which he has made. I have conceived it to be my duty to correct some misapprehensions of law and fact into which, I presume, the gentleman has accidentally fallen. That is the whole issue between us. Now, what does Chief Justice Woodbury say in the opinion which the gentleman has partially quoted? He says:

"Such is the case of a portion being lost by perils of the sea, or by being thrown overboard to save the ship, or by fire, or piracy, or larceny."

There he refers to an act on shipboard, while the goods are in transitu from the port whence they are exported to the port where they are imported.

"—or by barratry, or a sale and delivery on the voyage, or by natural decay. If there be a material loss, it can make no difference to the sufferer or the Government whether it happened by natural or artificial causes. In either case, the article to that extent is not here to be assessed, nor to be of any value to the owner."

Again, he says:

"But much more should duties not be exacted on what was lost or destroyed on its way hither, and which never came even into the possession or control of the custom-house officers, and much loss into the use of the community."

Now, sir, I have been able to find but three acts of Congress in which the precedent contended for by the gentleman is laid down; and what are they? The first act I find is in the sixth volume United States Statutes at Large, page 2. To what extent does it go? It is an act for the relief of Thomas Jenkins & Co., and provides that

"Duties amounting to $167 50 be remitted on certain parcels of hemp, &c., the property of Thomas Jenkins & Co., merchants of the city of Hudson, in the State of New York, which were lost by fire on the brig Minerva, in her passage from New York to the city of Hudson, her port of delivery."

Does that sustain the position of the gentleman from New York? Does that go to the extent of making the Federal Government an insurer of all goods imported into the country?

Now, what is the next act referred to in the report of the committee? It is to be found in the second volume of the Statutes at Large, page 201. It is an act for the relief of sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth. It provides that "Persons who, being indebted to the United States for duties on merchandise, have given bonds therefor, with one or more sureties, payable to the collector for the district of Portsmouth, and who have suffered the loss of property by the late conflagration at that place, shall be, and they hereby are, allowed to take out or have canceled, all bonds heretofore given for duties as aforesaid, upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sum of their former bonds respectively, payable in ten months from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or canceled as aforesaid."

They were merely authorized to give new bonds. It was a mere extension of time. There was no remission of duties. Now, I put it to the gentleman from New York, in all candor and sincerity, how can he look down from his sublimated and transcendental height upon such principles and facts as these?

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think that there is a misapprehension in regard to this bill on the part of gentlemen on all sides of this House. Before I turned my attention to it, I had the impression that there was some provision in the warehousing act of 1854 which excluded the claimants under this bill from going back beyond a certain period, sometime in 1846. Now that is all a mistake.

Here is a general law in which the Government has provided for all cases, prospective and retrospective, that came within the principles recognized by that Congress. If these parties cannot avail themselves of the benefits of that law, it is not because of the lapse of time; it is not because there is any peculiar hardship in their cases; but because they do not come within the principles of the act, and because the facts of the loss are not such as to entitle them to its benefits. That is the whole difficulty about the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said that this case has been often presented, often acted upon, reports made by committees of the House, and bills passed by both Houses of Congress. It will be recollected, sir, that the losses provided for in this bill happened in 1845. Down to 1854 there were applications in these and other cases of a similar character; and in 1854 a general law was passed which, as was supposed, covered all that these parties claimed, and satisfied all demands of this description.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will ask the gentleman whether the provisions of the law of 1854 do not make the law applicable to goods, wares, and merchandise destroyed while in bonded warehouses? Then, sir, I will inform the gentleman that prior to the year 1846, when the warehouse law was passed, merchandise of all kinds except liquors were deposited, not in bonded warehouses, but in the warehouses of the merchants. Liquors, however, were, previously to that time, deposited in bonded cellars. Therefore, under that law, $109,000 of duty levied on liquors was restored out of this $400,000 paid for duties on merchandise generally, and the balance still remains unpaid.

Mr. STANTON. I certainly so understood it. The difference in the principle recognized by the act of 1854 is this: that where the recognized possession and control of the goods has passed from the officers of the Government to the importer, he is responsible for them. It is his negligence if they are destroyed, and therefore the loss must be his. But so long as they are retained by the Government for any purpose, if they are in Government warehouses, and under the control of Government officers, and are destroyed, then the provision is that the Government refunds the duties. That is the plain principle. It is a common-sense principle—a principle that was recognized in this case, and which I believe all parties were willing to stand by, except those who have lost goods under different circumstances.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, if this fire occurred in 1846 or 1847, he does not suppose that these same goods would have been in bonded warehouses?

Mr. STANTON. It is impossible for me to say. I suppose that part of them would have been in bonded warehouses, and part of them in wholesale stores. It would depend entirely on the option of the owner. Whenever the owner wants them out of the warehouse, and in his own possession, of course he will take them there. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said that duties have been received on goods that have not entered into the consumption of the country, and that, therefore, these duties should be refunded—that the Government should not profit by them. Will the gentleman please indicate to me at what precise point the consumption of an article commences?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Does the gentleman wish me to reply?

Mr. STANTON. I do not wish a reply on that point. Every gentleman knows the fact as well as he does. The cloth out of which my coat is made has entered into the consumption of the country, for it is pretty well worn. But does it follow that the moment an original package is broken open, the goods in that package enter into the consumption of the country? I take it not. The question here is whether there is a stronger equitable claim in favor of the wholesale merchant who pays duty on his goods, than there is in favor of the retail merchant who buys the goods, and in whose possession the goods are destroyed? Now, the retail merchants in my town and in my district buy goods from the wholesale merchants, and pay these duties, with the profit, take them home for consumption, and before they enter into consumption, and while they are in their stores and on their shelves, a fire may come and destroy them. Who refunds duties to them? Who asks to have such duties as these refunded? Nobody.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. The distribution is more extensive.

Mr. STANTON. I know that, but there was no more consumption. I will tell you the difference. The difference, Mr. Chairman, is this: that where capital is aggregated in large masses, and in the hands of a few men, and where the loss is a large sum, these gentlemen can afford to prosecute their claims, to present themselves before the Government, and to expend money in the prosecution of their claims, and have their duties refunded; but where these goods are distributed over the country, and where one man in Maine loses $1,000 in duties, and another man in Texas loses $1,000 in duties, on goods destroyed by fire, it is not worth following up the claim to Congress, and therefore they have to bear the loss. And it is the difference that always exists between capital collected in large masses in the hands of a few, where a loss of this kind must always be large, and capital distributed in the hands of many, and where losses are proportionably small.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose the principle on which the refunding of these duties is confined to unbroken packages, is this: that if you go beyond that, you are liable to have the Government cheated. If we confine the refunding of duties to the original packages, then there can be no cheating about it. But if you undertake to follow the goods after they have been distributed through the country, then the way is open for every species of fraud. There must be a limit somewhere. I take it that it rests on principles analogous to those on which is based the statute of limitations. If a man has paid a debt, he is supposed to keep his receipt for six years, and after that he is not required to produce it, and may take advantage of the statute of limitations. There is a broad distinction between original unbroken packages and goods scattered promiscuously through the country. We know that under the State laws of Maryland, the State takes cognizance of imported merchandise after the packages are broken, for the purpose of taxation. Previously to that they are supposed to be under the control of the General Government, and cannot be taxed by the State for any purpose. They are in the hands of the Government; and so long as they are in the hands of the Government, they are not subject to the police regulations or taxes. And so long I hold the Government is bound to refund the money if they have wrongfully taken it.

Mr. STANTON. I am not familiar with the precise point of time—not representing a sea-board district in which duties are levied upon imported goods—at which the State laws take the control of imported goods. But, Mr. Chairman, I have supposed (possibly I may be mistaken) that the very moment goods are landed in the warehouse of the private merchant, and the duties paid, and the lien of the Government gone, that very moment they are subject to State control and State taxation.

Mr. HOWARD. As to the time when the State laws take jurisdiction, I would refer to the decision made by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Brown vs. The State of Maryland, which, I believe, is still the settled law and the general understanding.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I must inquire of the gentleman whether, in that case, the decision of the court was not that the State could not exercise the taxing power while the import duty remains unpaid? Does it not say that the power claimed for the State cannot intercept the duty demanded by the General Government? If so, I submit whether the payment of the import duty does not fill all the conditions which give power to the United States to restrain the action of the State authority? Is not this the point of the case cited?

Mr. HOWARD. That is not my recollection. Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That is my recollection.

Mr. STANTON. It strikes me as the natural and common-sense rule that the very moment the laws of the General Government lost control by the payment of the duties, when the Government had no further interest in interfering with the control of the State authorities over the imported goods, as a matter of course the State authorities, eo instanti, attaches, and the State has the right to tax the property. And it does not seem to me that any State would tolerate for a moment the practice of allowing goods to come within its jurisdiction, or of any considerable amount of capital to be invested in imported goods, and, after the duties were paid, allowing them to remain in warehouses in original packages for any considerable period of time. I am aware that the principle laid down by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is the principle contended for by the advocates of this bill; but it is not the principle recognized by congressional legislation, and it is not the principle which has ever been recognized by the authorities of this Government. The principle is that when the custody and control of the goods passes from the officers of the Federal Government the liability of the Government to refund ceases, and it rests upon the plain and straightforward principle that the party who has possession of the goods, and through whose neglect destruction may happen by fire, shall suffer the loss.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If that is the principle on which the Government proceeds, how happened it that in 1838 a law was passed by Congress refunding duties upon goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York, in 1835, under precisely similar circumstances as those of the fire of 1845?

Mr. STANTON. Of course I have not turned my attention to the various acts of Congress, and I think, in all human probability, Congress may, in various instances, out of pure charity, have made specific legislation for particular individuals, under peculiar circumstances, which they considered as of extreme hardship. But here stands a general law which authorizes the officers of the Government to make restitution under the circumstances which I have stated, and that I take to be the principle upon which it rests. If goods are destroyed while in the custody of the officers of the Government, the owners may well claim that, non constat, it was on account of the want of diligence on the part of the officers of the Government that the loss happened; and therefore the owners have the right to ask that anything they have paid to the Government shall be refunded.

There is another thing. This risk of loss from destruction by fire is one of the ordinary risks of all commercial transactions. Every merchant understands it, and every merchant provides against it by insuring his merchandise. There is no more uniform rule than that. Then I take it for granted the very moment these imported goods come into the custody and possession of the importing merchant, he provides against loss from destruction by fire by an insurance. That is common prudence, and it would be negligence not to do so.

I now desire to call the attention of the committee to the very peculiar provisions of this bill. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIG] was clearly right in contending that this was not a private bill, any more than a bill would be for refunding duties upon railroad iron. I want to know why the bill provides for refunding duties only for a single fire which happened on the 19th day of July, 1845? If the principle upon which these duties are to be refunded be right, then it is our business not to confine the refunding to duties paid on goods destroyed by fire upon that particular day, but to go the whole length, and provide for refunding duties in all cases where goods have been so destroyed under these peculiar circumstances.

Why, then, I pray you, is this bill framed to provide for losses in this particular fire, which it is said amount to some three hundred thousand dollars? I can tell you. If you insert a general provision of this kind, under which the Treasury could be drained to the amount of fifteen or twenty million dollars, gentlemen would look at it to see what it would be likely to cost the Government. Here, it is said, the loss is to be only about three hundred thousand dollars; and it is supposed that Congress may be induced to pass a bill, the aggregate contribution under which will not exceed that sum. Well, permit me to say that I have no very confident assurance, and am by no means well convinced, that the proofs of the losses upon that particular day, and in that particular fire, will not exceed $300,000. I think you will be exceedingly fortunate if you get off with double that sum.

I know that if that be so, the appropriation is only $300,000, and you cannot pay it all. But when you have passed this bill, appointed your own commissioners, taken the proof, and made the report, and it is shown that you have paid only fifty per cent. upon a debt which you acknowledge you are honestly liable for, with what face can you refuse to appropriate the rest? I know well how these things are done. Here is the entering wedge. If Congress once recognizes the principle that we are liable to refund the duties upon goods destroyed which have passed from the custody and control of the officers of the Government, upon the payment of duties, into the hands of the owner, then you have opened a most capital mine for digging into the national Treasury, and the digging will be exceedingly rich, I have no doubt.

It is said by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], a gentleman in whose judgment and integrity I have the utmost confidence, that the principle upon which he is disposed to act is, that the original packages had not been broken, and therefore he thinks the duties ought to be refunded. Now, sir, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is right in regard to the law to which he referred, then the gentleman from Michigan is wrong as to his principle. If the goods have passed from the jurisdiction and control of the authorities of the United States; and become subject to State legislation, State assessment, and State taxation, then the Government ought not to be bound to refund; and if the State control originates on the payment of the duties, then, of course, there can be no refunding in the case.

I understand the gentleman to say, that if the wholesale merchant has had the boxes in which the goods were imported—the original packages—deposited in his cellar, but has not taken off the lids when the fire occurs, then the duties are to be refunded. But if, on the other hand, he has removed the lids from the boxes, and placed the goods on his shelves, then there is to be no refunding. Now, you have to draw the line somewhere, but I see no reason for drawing it at that precise point. If you do not stop at the precise point where the possession changes, there is no other point; there is no reason why every retail merchant in the country should not have the duties refunded on goods destroyed by fire.

Now, I have said all that I designed to say in relation to this bill. It is an important one, not only on account of the amount which is sought to be appropriated by it, but it is important as a departure from the principle upon which the Government placed itself by the general law of 1854; which makes a different point—the payment of the duties, and the change of the possession of the goods—the point at which the liability to refund ceases. This bill changes that principle entirely, and I submit that, if the House should pass it, they would be establishing a precedent of great magnitude, and one, it seems to me, that would be very injurious to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HASKIN obtained the floor; but yielded it to

Mr. GREENWOOD, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration House bill No. 204, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

HARBOR AT SABINE.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the improvement of the bar and harbor at Sabine, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

And then, on motion of Mr. BLISS, (at five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday.

IN SENATE.

Monday, April 19, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. G. W. COOMBS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. POLK an additional member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, in accordance with the order of the Senate of Thursday last.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the contract with Russell, Majors & Waddell, for beef cattle, in March, 1858, and contracts made without public notice for the purchase of horses, cattle, grain, or other supplies up to this date, in connection with the Utah expedition.

Mr. BIGLER. I move that that communication lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that the communication from the Secretary of War will be printed, so that we may be able to see what is in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. I move that it be printed.

Mr. BIGLER. The deficiency bill, as I understand, has been made the special order for to-day at half past twelve o'clock; and if the motion to print were adopted, it would seem to deprive us of the opportunity of using that important paper in the consideration of the bill to-day. I think it is such a document as can be understood by a reading at the Clerk's desk. I suggest that the motion to print may involve the whole question of proceeding with the deficiency bill to-day. With that view, I do not feel like voting in favor of printing the document.

Mr. HUNTER. If we now order this document to be printed, we shall not have it here while we are discussing the deficiency bill. I want to get that bill up to-day. It is the special order. The manuscript papers communicated can be examined by any gentleman.

Mr. SLIDELL. Why not let the order be made for the printing?

Mr. HUNTER. It would go out of the possession of the Senate, and thus delay the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Let us keep the paper in the possession of the Senate, but order it to be printed, so that it can be sent to the printers when we adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not understand that making an order for printing a paper takes it from the control of the Senate. I suppose that a copy will be furnished to the printers. I am not advised upon that subject, but I suppose they do not set up the type from the original papers. We may, therefore, have the use of the document to-day, and by to-morrow morning we may have it printed, if we order the printing now. This is a very important matter.

Mr. HUNTER. The printers do set up from the original papers. We have not force enough here to copy the papers before sending them to be printed. If it were not for that, I should much rather have the order made. They cannot be printed, however, unless we send the papers away from the Senate. That is the only objection I have to it; we shall lose possession of the papers, and we want them here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that the practice was as stated by the Senator from Virginia. It seems to me very extraordinary that the original papers should be sent to the printing office from the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. Such is the practice, as I understand it. There is not force enough in the Secretary's office to copy the papers sent here, in order to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed there were clerks in the offices who made these copies for the printer. It ought to be so. Surely, it is a very unsafe way of transacting the business of the Senate, to allow its original papers to be sent off to the printing office. If such is the practice, and the original paper is to go to the printer, I trust that it will still be ordered to be printed. This bill involves an appropriation of many millions of money, and we want to see the foundation for it. At this time, all of us upon all sides of the Senate, are desirous, I trust, of economizing in the expenditures of the Government. This is no party question; at least it ought to be no party question; and I trust it is not to run into one. The party in power professes to be in favor of an economical administration of the Federal Government. If these large appropriations are all right, let us have the means of examining and ascertaining that they are right. I cannot make so much difference whether this bill passes to-day or to-morrow, as to require that Senators should be compelled to vote upon it without understanding it distinctly. I want to see this document, and examine it. If the bill is to be taken up in half an hour, and we are to rely upon going to the Clerk's table and examining it, we know how imperfect the examination of every one must be; and but one Senator at a time could make the examination. I hope the order to print will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest that, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance wishes to take up the bill to-day, we can do that, and dispose of the propositions from our committee in regard to striking out certain clauses, upon which there will be some debate, and let the other matters go over until to-morrow. We can have these papers printed by to-morrow morning without difficulty. I suppose we can make some advance in the bill in that way to-day.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the order to print might be made, and still the papers be retained in the Senate until we adjourn. They can then be printed, and laid on our tables to-morrow morning.

Mr. HUNTER. I agree to that.

The motion to print was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, submitting an account of that State against the United States, under the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty of Washington, and praying for an appropriation to satisfy the same; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of Thomas Crown, praying to be allowed damages occasioned by the abrogation of contract made by him with Captain Blaney, for furnishing bricks for the fortifications of Oak Island; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STUART presented the memorial of Daniel B. Hibbard, praying for payment for his services in carrying the mail, under a special contract with the deputy postmaster at St. John's, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a memorial of merchants of New Orleans, praying that the "Collins line of steamers" be sustained; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a report of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, in favor of the establishment of a line of mail steamers between New Orleans and Bordeaux, as proposed by the memorial of W. C. Barney and others; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BIGLER presented two memorials of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for carrying the mails between Philadelphia and Southampton in the Collins line of steamers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of the agent of the State of Massachusetts, praying that an appropriation may be made for paying the claims of that State against the United States, arising under the treaty of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of Jonas P. Levy, relative to his claims against Mexico, and praying for the interposition of Congress for their settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of William Woodbury and other business men of Portland, Maine, praying for the enactment of a general relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced on board our ships of war as a means of improving the personnel of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a report from the Court of Claims on the case of the claimants of the brig General Armstrong, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 273) for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew, of the brig General Armstrong. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Randall Pegg, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 274) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jeremiah Pendergast, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 275) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 276) for the relief of Mrs. Ambrosie Brou, of the parish of St. Charles, State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that the President had signed and approved the following acts:

An act to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless.

An act for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BARCLAY, one of their clerks, announcing that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson;

A bill (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki.

MEXICAN PROTECTORATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I gave notice on Thursday last that I should move this morning to take up the resolutions some time since introduced by me in relation to the condition of affairs in Mexico; but, in consequence of the press of business, I shall not move to call it up this morning, but I intend to do so to-morrow morning.

THE SHIP SUSQUEHANNA.

Mr. MASON. I offer the following resolution, which I hope the Senate will now consider:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence or other papers containing information of the condition of the United States ship Susquehanna, on her late arrival at the island of Jamaica, and of the reception and assistance extended to her officers and crew, disabled by sickness, by the naval and civil authorities of Great Britain at that island.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. MASON. It is merely a resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to send in certain correspondence. I will say, in a word, that we have, through the newspapers, an account of the arrival of the ship Susquehanna at Kingston, in the island of Jamaica, with a large party of her crew and officers in a very disabled condition by the yellow fever. It comes through the newspapers only, but it is accompanied by a statement that very great and diligent attention was shown to them on their arrival by the naval authorities, and the admiral in command of the British squadron on that station. The circumstances attending it, I am sure, will address themselves as of very great interest to the sympathies of the American people. I desire to obtain the correspondence, that it may be laid officially before the country, and that the Senate, as one branch of Congress, may take into consideration whether this is an occasion for a national recognition of such signal services.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. HUNTER. As it is within five minutes of the time set for the special order, I move that the deficiency bill be now taken up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that is taken up, I wish to make a motion which I suppose will give rise to no debate, and it is a privileged matter. It will be remembered by the Senate that some time ago a resolution was adopted authorizing the taking of testimony in the case of the contested election of Senators from the State of Indiana. At the request of persons in Indiana, I applied, a few days since to the Secretary of the Senate for a copy of the resolution, supposing that, as a matter of course, it would be furnished, so that in case any of the parties mentioned in the resolution should desire to take testimony in Indiana, they might have a certified copy of the resolution before them, which they seemed to suppose would be proper. Perhaps the testimony could be taken without any such certified copy, but it would certainly be proper that a certified copy of the resolution should be before the officer by whom the testimony is taken, in case any should be taken. The Secretary of the Senate seemed to have some hesitation about furnishing a certified copy of the resolution, and rather preferred that I should move the Senate that he be directed to furnish it. I now make that motion, that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish a certified copy of the resolution which passed the Senate, authorizing the taking of testimony in the case alluded to, to any of the parties mentioned in the resolution, on their application.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois that there is a motion now pending before the Senate, which is to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill, and that his motion, at this time, is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTER. If the vote on the resolution can be taken without debate, I shall not object, but if it will lead to debate, I must object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I imagine there will be no debate upon it. I suppose there will be no resistance to my proposition.

Mr. BRIGHT. I apprehend there will be no objection whatever to granting the order moved by the Senator from Illinois. I will, however, avail myself of this occasion, as I have of every occasion when this case has been referred to, to state that I am very anxious to have it disposed of. So far as the taking of testimony is concerned, I have never myself attached a great deal of importance to it. My colleague and myself have differed somewhat on that head. I am content to rely upon the Journal of the House, which contains substantially a correct history of the case, with the exception of one single point, as to which testimony has already been taken in the form of ex parte affidavits. I am ready myself to have the case submitted to the committee, and so far as it is proper for me to express a preference as to the time, I would be glad if the committee would take it up to-day, to-morrow, next day, or, in other words, at the earliest period of time consistent with their other engagements. Entertaining not a particle of doubt about the validity of the election under which I hold my seat, I hear with impatience, I confess, an allusion from any quarter which questions that right; and nothing but an unwillingness to obtrude myself upon a body that I have the profound respect for that I have for this has prevented me from making a personal appeal to Senators to take up and dispose of my case at least. I do not know for what purpose this order is asked. If my colleague wishes to take other testimony than that which he now has, or if those for whom the Senator from Illinois speaks for desire to do so, I hope it will be done without delay. Action is what I desire.

Mr. HUNTER. If no further remarks are to be made, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Illinois; but if there are to be further remarks, I hope the Senate will lay it over until to-morrow morning, so that we may take up the deficiency bill, and make some progress in its consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not propose to make any argument, but to present a single suggestion in reply to the Senator from Indiana. I think he is entirely right in wishing an early decision of this case, and it is due to him that it should be early decided. I have thought so from the beginning. I do not make the application for this direction to the Secretary at the instance of the Senator from Indiana, but at the instance of parties who wrote to me from Indiana upon the subject; that in case they desired to take testimony it was thought to be desirable to have certified copies of the resolution.

Mr. FITCH. I hope this case will be disposed of at the earliest opportunity. My colleague has stated to the Senate what he has latterly uniformly stated in substance to me, namely: that no other evidence to fully establish our rights to our seats, in the estimation of any unprejudiced man, was necessary, than our credentials and the record; and, consequently, that he did not attach much importance to oral testimony. I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for the purpose of stating briefly the reasons which induced me to desire such testimony, and, at the time, and until lately, to deem it material.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, and that this matter cannot be proceeded with unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. FITCH. It will take but few minutes to go on with it and fix an early day for its decision. I agree with the Senator from Illinois and my colleague, that it should be early decided; and certainly the quicker it is decided, the more agreeable to me.

I left Indianapolis in February, 1857, to take my seat here, the Legislature of Indiana being then in session. On my arrival, I found a protest purporting to be from certain members of the General Assembly, accompanied by what was represented to be extracts from the Journals of the Senate and House. Knowing the proceedings of these bodies up to the time of my departure, from personal observation, I saw that what were represented to be extracts from the Senate's Journal were not true records of the proceedings of that body in the matter relative to which they were offered in evidence, and I knew of no other or better way to establish the truth than by oral testimony; and hence asked, last session, in the following language, that the Senate should authorize it to be taken:

"The undersigned, in conclusion, submits what, indeed, must be obvious to the committee, that as the witnesses and proofs to the matter above stated are only to be had in the State of Indiana, and can only properly be obtained by careful examination, and under the superintendence of himself, that it cannot be in his power to procure it at this or the approaching extra session of the United States Senate, even were he to abandon his duty as a Senator, which he has no right to do, and proceed at once to the place where the testimony is to be had. He further submits, therefore, that the committee will so dispose of the matter now as will enable him and the contestants, at a future period, to present the entire case fairly and fully before them."

I did not contemplate leaving the Senate during the session to take the testimony, but intended it should be taken during the recess. A resolution authorizing the testimony was introduced by the Committee on the Judiciary, and failed. I need not more than refer to the circumstances under which it failed. It failed in consequence of opposition on the other side of the Chamber. Had it then passed, the testimony would have been taken, and the matter long since been decided. Soon after the Senate adjourned, and I gave the matter no further attention.

Early in this session the same, or a similar, resolution was introduced from the same committee, and adopted. I have been anxious for weeks, as is well known to my colleague, and others, to leave here for the purpose of giving the notice, and taking testimony, contemplated by the resolution, but have not felt at liberty, in the present and past condition of the public business, to do so; and have been particularly unwilling to leave, and been asked not to leave, during the pendency of the all-absorbing Kansas question, which has created so much feeling here and throughout the country. There may, or may not, be time to take the testimony, and have it here by the day fixed by the resolution. Whether there be or not, I am not disposed to ask another hour's delay; for, since the adoption of that resolution, printed copies of the Senate and House Journals have, for the first time, fallen under my observation, and been examined by me; and I find much that I wished to prove matter of record in the House Journal. I am willing, therefore, and wish the case submitted, and early decided, upon the record, and such evidence as has been, or can be, obtained in this city. Let that, though ex parte, like the statements of the protestants, go to the committee and the Senate. It will be taken into consideration by them, and, like the protestants' statements, that weight given to it which they may deem it entitled. I trust, therefore, that the matter will be called up at once, at the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, not for the purpose of delay, but for reference to the committee, and a report and decision at the earliest day on which the Senate can agree.

Mr. HUNTER. If the vote can be taken without any remarks, I will suspend my motion; but if not, and if there is anything more to be said; I must call for the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no remarks to make. I am willing that the vote should be taken on the resolution. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require unanimous consent to consider and pass the resolution to-day.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, and it was adopted; as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate furnish, on application by any individual desiring to possess the same, an authenticated copy of the resolution agreed to on the 16th of February, authorizing testimony to be taken in reference to the election of the Hon. Jesse D. BRIGHT, and Hon. GRHAM N. FITCH, as Senators from the State of Indiana.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with two amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out the following clause:

To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the House, for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress, the usual additional compensation of $800 each, $4,600.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, that is a gratuity which is usually made by the House of Representatives, and sometimes by the Senate, to their reporters. It is a sum over and above what is agreed by contract to be paid to John C. Rives for reporting. It was put in by the House of Representatives; and being a mere gratuity, it was deemed inappropriate to the deficiency bill. For one, I do not know how far it is right to make these gratuities. You contract for a certain sum; and if that is not enough, you ought to give more by contract, and not do it by these provisions for extra pay. At any rate, this deficiency bill is not the place for it. It is generally made at the end of a session by resolution, and it ought to be provided for out of the contingent fund, or in the general appropriation bill. It would seem to be just, therefore, either to strike this out, or else have another appropriation of equal amount for our own reporters, who ought to be put on the same footing. But, sir, this is no place for the item, and I hope the Senate will strike it out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was to strike out the third section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been, or may be, made, under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress: Provided, That said allowances shall have been duly approved by the Committee on Accounts: And be it further provided, That the said allowances be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HUNTER. This item in the deficiency bill is founded upon a resolution passed by the House of Representatives, making certain provisions for extra pay, some of which provisions went back several years, I believe, in the case of one or two of their officers. When this item in his accounts was presented by the Clerk of the House to the Comptroller of the Treasury, he refused to pay it, because it was in opposition to the act of the 3d of March, 1845, which provides that—

"No part of the appropriations which may be made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress, shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives respectively, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant, of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant, who is so employed by a resolution of one of said Houses, nor in the purchase of books to be distributed to members."

Under the provisions of this law, the Comptroller and Secretary of the Treasury refused to allow this item in the Clerk's account, and refused to pay this sum, it being in opposition to a law which was passed by the whole Government, and the authority being only the resolution of one House. But inasmuch as it had been the practice before and since the passage of the law of 1845, to pass such resolutions in the House of Representatives, and such items in the accounts had been heretofore allowed, the Secretary recommended that Congress should provide for this case by a direct appropriation; and the House of Representatives did provide for it by this section. It was thought by the Finance Committee, however, that it was not right that we should, in opposition to a law, which was not only in existence, but believed to be a salutary one, sanction this by either House of Congress. So far as regards the disposition of the contingent fund in all matters in which the House has a right to control it, the Senate has never interfered with the other House, nor would it in regard to its disposition of that fund; but when a law has been made to limit and regulate the power and the discretion of the two Houses in the application of that fund, it would seem to be proper that we should adhere to it until the law is repealed. For that reason, the committee have recommended to the Senate to strike out the third section of this bill.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. President, I was one of those who, in committee, voted to strike out this third section; but since I gave that vote in committee, I have some doubt as to the propriety of striking it out, and my doubt arises from the nature of the intercourse that ought to exist between the two Houses. As has been said by the Senator from Virginia, up to the present case, since the passage of the act of 1845, these allowances have been made by the House of Representatives, and have been passed without question by the accounting officers of the Treasury. It seems to me, therefore, that in consequence of this practice of the Government in relation to these allowances, the House of Representatives, and the officers of that House, had a right to expect that they would be passed as they had heretofore been passed. These allowances were made under that expectation; and a portion of them, I understand, have been paid by the late Clerk of the House of Representatives under the expectation that they would be passed without question by the accounting officers. I am clearly of the opinion that it is in violation of the act of the 3d of March, 1845; but in consequence of this uniform practice since the act of 1845, up to the present case, it seems to me it would be rather improper now to strike out these allowances from the appropriation bill, thus subjecting, it may be, the late Clerk of the House of Representatives to loss, and certainly disappointing the well-grounded expectations of those who had these allowances made to them. It is proper, I believe, before the question is put on striking out, to perfect the section; and, having my doubts as to the propriety of striking it out entirely, and being unwilling that this practice should pass without disapprobation, so far as further appropriations are concerned, so as to give distinct notice to the House of Representatives that it will not be further tolerated, I desire to move an amendment before the question is taken on striking out the section, by adding as a further proviso the following:

And he it further provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to approve or justify any further appropriation in violation of the second section of the act of Congress, approved on the 3d of March, 1845, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1846, and for other purposes."

Mr. HUNTER. I certainly shall not object to the amendment. It will probably be an improvement if the Senate determine to retain the third section. I apprehend, however, it will have very little influence. If the original law of 1845 has been set aside by the action of one House of Congress, and if we sanction that course, it is questionable whether they will regard our reiteration of the opinion that the law ought to be carried out hereafter. I feel, as the Senator from North Carolina has said, that, in regard to appropriations from the contingent fund, so far as either House has discretion, the other ought not to interfere with the exercise of that discretion, nor have I ever voted to do so in my life. But when a law has been passed in order to remedy abuses of this discretion, and to limit the discretion, it seems to me, unless we think that law is improper and ought to be repealed, we should enforce and adhere to it. If the law is wrong, it ought to be repealed; if the law is right, we ought to carry it out.

Mr. BELL. Are we not a little too late in acting upon the suggestions of the honorable Senator from Virginia? It seems, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that we have suffered the construction under which the other House acted, to prevail for a great many years. Allowances of this description have been made by a separate resolution of the House of Representatives, I infer from the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, for some five or six years past, during two or three Congresses. We have thereby, by our oversight, to say nothing of the negligence of the other House, if they had that act of 1845 in view—we have by our own conduct here, in making appropriations for the contingent fund, sufficient to pay all these allowances from year to year, encouraged them to believe, even if they had any knowledge of that act, that the Senate would not insist upon such a construction of it as to prevent them, at their discretion, from making what allowances they pleased to their own employes.

Is there not something to be considered in reference to the point suggested by the honorable Senator from North Carolina? The honorable Senator from Virginia has had sufficient experience in Congress to know how difficult, how irritating, and how dangerous a collision between the two Houses is likely to become on a question of this sort. I think he will remember that we had some experience of this in relation to certain payments we desired to make, and did make, out of our contingent fund, for books published under the separate order of the Senate of the United States. I do not remember the particular case; but I remember very well that a late Senator from North Carolina, who sat on this side of the House, (Mr. Badger,) was the active mover and advocate of that separate appropriation by the Senate; and an advocate of the principle that the House of Representatives had no right to interpose any authority to prevent such an appropriation of the contingent fund voted to this House as we thought proper to make.

I rather think—nay, I am certain, that that debate and contest arose since the passage of the act of 1845. The honorable Senator from Virginia, I think, was on the same side then as he is now in relation to the question; but I am not certain of that. However, whether he advocated the right of the Senate to dispose of its contingent fund as it thought proper or not, I do not remember that that law was interposed as an objection to what the Senate wanted to do on that occasion. I think the difficulty at that time, though threatening to cause considerable trouble between the two Houses, was settled by a committee of conference. All of us who have had any experience in parliamentary usages, or in the legislation of Congress, know the sensitiveness and difficulty that are certain to arise when one House undertakes to interpose its construction of a law, or in any other way to interfere with the appropriations for the contingent fund of the other, which are supposed to be made for the purpose of being applied under the discretion of a separate House.

The act of 1845—I do not remember that my attention was ever called to it before—is very well founded on sound principles. It was wise and judicious when applied to the officers of the Government generally; but when applied, as it evidently was intended to be, so as to put it in the power of one branch of Congress to check a supposed or alleged extravagance in the practice of the other, it was an act the propriety and wisdom of which might have been well questioned; for, sir, when the country ceases to have such confidence in Congress that they are not willing that either branch shall have the power of applying its contingent fund to whatever objects it thinks proper, within the Constitution, for the payment of its own employes, or for furnishing the accommodations it may think requisite for the transaction of its business, the country is lost.

Now, sir, if it be the fact, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose report is before me—and I believe that it will not be denied—that for many years since 1845 a different construction from that for which he contends has been placed upon the law, does it not, at all events, afford reason for passing this appropriation, particularly with the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from North Carolina? The act of 1845 implies a distrust as to the trustworthiness of either branch of Congress—a want of confidence in their fidelity to their duties—to such an extent that it will not suffer them to make any appropriation of money out of their contingent fund for any accommodation they may desire; not only in the Hall of Representatives, but the same principle applies to every other accommodation and facility they may think they may need in the transaction of the public business. This being the case, I doubt very much whether it is not due to both Houses of Congress that that act should be repealed.

These allowances having been made, and a demand of payment insisted upon, and some payments, as appears from the papers which are before me, reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, having already been made to the amount of many thousands of dollars—twelve or fifteen thousand perhaps, I do not know how many—in the confidence that the same rule of construction would continue in regard to the whole of these allowances that had been applied heretofore by the Senate for so long a time, does not present an appeal to the discretion of the Senate to make this appropriation? At the same time, the Senate may, if they think proper, by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, intimate to the House of Representatives that no more such allowances will be sanctioned by the Senate by making appropriations to pay them. I think that would save the Senate; and being understood, would discourage the violation of the existing law on the subject, and at the same time do justice to the House of Representatives.

I think these are good reasons. I think, considering the relations of the two Houses to each other, and the necessity of maintaining harmony between them, they are solid reasons. And whatever we may think of the propriety of the course of the House of Representatives in making these allowances; however uncalled for we may think they were; whatever degree of extravagance we may think attaches to them; however unnecessary we may regard them; yet, considering that they were made by the House of Representatives, one of the branches of the Congress of the United States, with whom we cannot move at all in legislation but by acting in concert and coöperating in harmony, I believe we may well vote this appropriation without going into the question whether the allowances were properly made by that House, or in conformity with existing law. I am perfectly willing, however, to adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. It seems obligations and responsibilities have already been incurred, and certainly they should be discharged. When my attention was first called to this subject, I asked if it was connected in any way with what I had heard about the books voted to the members of the other House, supposing it might be connected with them in some form or other. I received for answer, that there was no connection between them whatever; and I saw, on reading the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that it is not supposed by him that there is any connection. Now, the language of the Secretary of the Treasury is worth reading:

"The greatest reluctance I have felt in coming to this conclusion [that is, that he could not pay the money] arises from the apprehension that injustice may be done to the persons whose claims have thus been recognized, and the officers of the Senate and House, who have acted in good faith in complying with the directions of their respective Houses."

"I have no doubt that these officers have so acted; and, in refusing to settle their accounts, no imputation is intended to be thrown upon their official conduct."

"In paying these accounts, they have only done what they were required to do, and what long-established usage justified them in doing."

The usage, I understand, has prevailed since 1845.

"Under such circumstances, they should be protected from any loss or injury, and I have no doubt Congress will do it. The accounts must be suspended, however, until the meeting of Congress, when I will recommend the passage of a law authorizing the Department to pass them."

"In this way these officers can be amply protected, a wise and good law vindicated, and a bad practice corrected."

I do not see that the Secretary of the Treasury himself has had any hesitation as to the propriety or the expediency of voting this appropriation, or otherwise I should not have said one word on the subject.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I concur very fully in what has been said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, and the honorable Senator from North Carolina, in relation to the exceeding delicacy of interference on the part of one House with the disposal by the other of its contingent fund; and if I understood that the House of Representatives had made a point of this matter, and after mature consideration had determined to adhere to its power, whether I believed that power to be well founded or not, I should not be disposed to raise an issue with the House on a matter so delicate as this; I would not conceive that the public interests justified it; but I remember reading with some attention the debates in the other House on this deficiency bill, and there are some circumstances in relation to this appropriation which ought to be called to the notice of the Senate. In the first place, one of the gentlemen in the House of Representatives, who sustained the propriety of this appropriation, was called upon by one of its opponents expressly to declare whether, when the resolution was offered in the last Congress for the allowance of these extra payments to the clerks of the last House of Representatives, the intention of the mover was to allow extra pay for antecedent Congresses. That question was put repeatedly, and evaded. The very gentleman who supported the resolution allowing this extra sum to the officers of the House of Representatives refused to say, when called upon, that that was their intention in offering the resolution; but the resolution was so worded as to give color to the construction that the House of Representatives of the last Congress was not simply making an extra allowance to its own officers, but actually was raising the salary of its officers, and paying them an addition to their salary for a long series of antecedent years.

Now, sir, I have no doubt of the power of the House of Representatives over its contingent fund, when not exercised in contravention of existing law. It is admitted on all sides here that there is an act of Congress positively prohibiting either House from making use of its contingent fund for increasing the compensation of its officers beyond that fixed by the House when the officers are employed. It is said that that law has been violated, and that the sanction of the Departments has been given to that violation. It may be so; abuses do spring up in these matters in all governments; but I think gentlemen will find by a reference to this subject that this is the first time when the power has been claimed by either House to allow extra compensation to its officers, not only for services done to that House, but for services done to former Houses. I know of no instance like this.

I also observed, in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, that there was a strenuous opposition on the part of a large number of the members of that House to the allowance of this item, and that efforts were made to get a vote on it; but, by reason of the rules of the House, and the particular position into which this bill had got, it was found impossible, without unanimous consent, to permit a vote of the House to be taken on this item. That member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House who had charge of the bill, had promised those who opposed this item of the bill that they should have a special vote on it, to take the sense of the House upon it, and he endeavored to redeem his promise; but, when the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole and got into the House again, the previous question was ordered, and it required unanimous consent. That unanimous consent was refused, and the consequence was that there was no vote in the House by yeas and nays on the proposition to pay this sum. At least, I think that was the case. My memory is so, and I read the proceedings with some attention.

Now, as they have had no opportunity to vote on this allowance in the other House, as members have not been called upon to say yea or nay to this distinct proposition, I consider that it is not one of those cases in which we are interfering with the proper authority of the House over its contingent fund. If we say we do not approve of this item, and send it back for their reconsideration, we do not thereby say that, if the House determines that it will exercise this control over its fund, and make this disposition of sixty or seventy thousand dollars as a gratuity to gentlemen for services rendered in former years, we will resist it to the bitter end; but it is our duty to express our disapprobation of it, if we feel this disapprobation. We are as much the constitutional guardians of the Treasury as the House is, and it is as much our duty not to vote for an improper appropriation as it is the duty of the House. I believe this appropriation to be an improper one, and I must vote to strike it out. If the House shall persist, upon deliberation, and will determine that it will make this appropriation out of its contingent fund, the question will then recur whether the issue between the two branches is of sufficient importance to lead us to the loss of this bill. For one, I am prepared to say in advance that I will vote for the bill with this appropriation rather than lose it; but I desire to vote an expression of my disapprobation of the appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted in committee with the other members of the Committee on Finance for the amendment that is proposed; and I did it upon the simple principle which has been stated by the chairman, that on examination, we came to the conclusion that the original order or resolution, as it was passed by the House of Representatives, was against law; that it was against a positive prohibition of law to appropriate even the contingent fund of either House in the manner proposed. That being the case, as a member of the Committee on Finance, I felt bound to recommend the striking out of this provision; but I do not feel bound, as a member of the Senate, to insist strenuously that the Senate shall carry into effect this recommendation which the committee saw fit to make. I do not propose now to argue the question at all, but simply to state a few considerations on the one side and the other in reference to this amendment, for the reflection of the Senate.

I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Tennessee that any and every disposition which either House may see fit to make of its contingent fund should be passed by without question by the other; because, in the first place, I think there should be some true understanding of what amount of money is to be appropriated for the use of the House. It will not do, I apprehend, to appropriate just such a sum of money for contingent expenses, to be under the control of either House, as each House may desire, and then to say, with reference to the amount thus appropriated, that the other branch shall not interfere with it under any given circumstances.

Mr. BELL. I did not say so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I so understood the Senator; but if he did not say so, very well.

Mr. BELL. I trust I shall be allowed to explain. Of course, if it was an extraordinary or unreasonable amount, that would bear on its face an evidence that the sum ought not to be voted; and so if it was for objects and under circumstances altogether out of the course of such appropriations for the accommodation of the House or its employes. I did not mean to say so unreasonable a thing as the honorable Senator seems to impute to me, that under no circumstances would I look into these appropriations, or inquire into or dissent from them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not impute anything at all to the Senator, but I say his principle, as laid down, certainly would carry us that length; and surely it will not do to say, that, when there is a positive prohibition of law, that the contingent fund of either House shall not be appropriated for certain specified purposes, one House is at liberty to disregard that provision of law, and the other is to submit to it on the principle that it is not courteous to interfere on account of the deference and respect one House should have for the other. I should not accede to that principle, at any rate; and if the Senator did not mean to go that length, of course my remarks will not apply to anything he has said.

But, sir, there is a great deal to be said on the other side in reference to this matter. The law now relied upon was passed in 1845, and the accounting officers of the Treasury and the heads of the Treasury Department, from that time down to the present, have considered that that law expired with the year. Being put upon an appropriation bill, it has been considered that it had no effect beyond that appropriation bill itself, and the time for which that appropriation bill existed was for the year. That was the construction put upon it by Mr. Whittlesey. He gave a long written opinion upon the subject to the Secretary of the Treasury recently, and stated that that had been the uniform construction. Mr. Guthrie sanctioned that construction; it was so understood; and from 1845 down to the present year, it has been understood by the accounting officers of the Treasury, by Congress, by both branches of Congress, that it had no sort of existence but had gone out of date, had expired, was not an existing, acting law which should guide or bind anybody.

That being the fact, that being the construction placed on it by both branches of Congress in their action for year after year previous to last year, and by the accounting officers of the Treasury and by the head of the Treasury Department, there is certainly a great deal of excuse for saying that the House of Representatives might suppose the law did not exist. But Mr. Cobb, the present Secretary of the Treasury, when he came to revise the action of the House, on examining this law of 1845, arrived at a different conclusion. I have examined the peculiar phraseology of the provision of the act of 1845, with a view to see whether his construction is correct, or whether the other is correct; and I confess, on examination, from the language of that statute, I believe his construction is the correct one, and it is an existing law. Still, there is the fact that such was not the construction of Mr. Whittlesey for years; such was not the construction of the Secretaries of the Treasury; such was not the construction of either House of Congress, until the period when this matter came under examination by the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Acting upon that assumption, which everybody had supposed to be the correct one, at the last session of the last Congress the resolutions in question were passed by the House of Representatives, supposing they had a right to pass them, and in fact they were passed almost without notice. Under these resolutions the Clerk of the House of Representatives acted. Under these resolutions certain officers of the House have acted with reference to the disposition of an amount of money they supposed to be coming to them. That action has been had, money has been paid, claims on the Treasury have been disposed of by men supposing them to exist under these resolutions, and under the previously existing action of the Treasury Department and of Congress itself.

Well, now, sir, that being the case, it comes to be a mere question of discussion whether this Congress will sanction that action, or whether it will take advantage of the new discovery by the present Secretary of the Treasury with regard to the existing law, and refuse to do, what under any other circumstances it would do. That is the way I understand the question as presented; and the Secretary of the Treasury himself, in the clause of his report that has been read by the Senator from Tennessee, recommends that this amount should be paid. It is for the Senate to say whether it will pay it or not. As a member of the Committee on Finance I could not but yield my assent to striking it out, because the committee ought not to recommend (and I suppose their action is a recommendation) that a provision of law actually existing should be disregarded. Still I think it is perfectly competent for the Senate if it sees fit, to overrule that action on the general principles applicable to the case, arising from the peculiar state of existing facts.

Now, one word as to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Louisiana. I happened to hear the debate in the House of Representatives to which he refers, and I have read it since in the papers. I did not draw from it the inference he did—that there was an evasion of the question. When I heard it in the House, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX], to whom the question was put, stated repeatedly: "I will explain, if the member will allow me to explain;" but the gentleman on the floor said: "I want a categorical answer, yes or no; I have no time to hear explanations," and the answer was: "Let me explain in my own way, and you shall have a full explanation." That was not allowed. I do not understand that to be an evasion. That was all I saw about it; but whether there was an impropriety in the matter or not, I am not able to say, and I have nothing to say on that subject. I think it is a question that addresses itself to the discretion of the Senate, and to the opinion which the Senate may have as to the comity due in such cases from one branch of Congress to the other.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote, Mr. President, to retain this section in the bill. I think it is just that it should be retained. I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury, who has arrested this payment, is in favor of its being retained. The House of Representatives directed the Clerk to do certain duties, under which resolution fifteen or eighteen thousand dollars have been paid out. He has been arrested by this new construction of an old law. That being the case, I think we should retain this section, and then arrest the system of extra pay in both Houses of Congress. The House of Representatives has been accustomed for years to pay extra compensation. The Senate has done the same thing. Even at the last session of Congress, I think, the Senator from Virginia will find that we paid clerks for sixty days after the adjournment. I think that every year I have been here we have given extra compensation. In my judgment, it should be stopped; but I do not see why we should begin with a past House of Representatives. Let this be carried out. Eighteen thousand dollars have been expended, I understand, under that resolution of the House of Representatives, by the Clerk. I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that in justice the action under the resolution of the House of Representatives ought to be completed. Then we should stop here with a fair understanding as to the matter. For that reason, I shall vote to retain this section as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART. I certainly cannot find myself able to vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, aside from anything contained in the section itself. In the first place, if we pass this section, we do approve of the payment, so far as our action is concerned; and, so far as any disapproval is concerned, it is found in the language of Senators on this floor. I am opposed to any amendment which proposes to contradict the effect of the section passed. It is equivalent to saying, we vote $20,000, but we do not mean to vote it. Next, so far as it may be notice hereafter to the House of Representatives, I cannot agree to it in that respect; for I do not think it is proper for one House to say to the other, "we will do this act this time, but we will not do it again." In fact, sir, I confess there is very great force in what has been said by the Senator from Maine on the whole question. As an original proposition, I doubt very much the propriety of a law which undertakes to limit the expenditure of the contingent fund of either House, for the reason that the expenditure of that fund depends upon emergencies. An emergency arises, the effect of which ought to be determined by the House whose fund it is, and that House ought to be held responsible for it. There is a sufficient check growing out of the fact alluded to both by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Tennessee. If there is an unusual, an extraordinary, an unjustifiable appropriation of the contingent fund upon any occasion, reject that; reject it at the time; but to lay down a general rule, and say that under no circumstances shall either House pay out of its contingent fund any extraordinary expenses is, in my humble opinion, what ought never to be said.

But it seems that the construction of the law of 1845, down to the inauguration of the present Secretary of the Treasury, has been uniform, that it terminated with the year, and such allowances have been heretofore made. In this instance, it is asserted that they have been paid; and the present Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding he refuses to pass the account, recommends that Congress enact a law authorizing him to pass it. That is his judgment. We have, then, the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the judgment of the House of Representatives upon the question.

Now, is there anything in this subject so important in itself, so aggravating in its character, as to induce the Senate to interpose, and to say, we will refuse our assent? I confess to you it does not so strike me. But, sir, my purpose in rising chiefly was to say, in respect to this amendment, that, while I know the good faith in which the Senator from North Carolina offered it—and I appreciate fully his motives—yet its character is such that I cannot agree to it. I cannot agree, as I said, to an amendment which in its terms purports to give a different construction to an act from what the act itself bears. Nor can I agree to it so far as it may be contemplated as a notice to the other House in future. It is a very delicate question to make an intimation by one House to the other as to what they may expect in the future.

Mr. BIGGS. I certainly do not agree with the Senator from Michigan in regard to the propriety of the act of 1845. The most of his argument is against the law. I am convinced of the propriety of the law; I think it is a proper law. Its object was to prevent the allowance of extra compensation to officers who had regular salaries fixed by law, and to prevent one House from increasing those salaries without the concurrence of the other. I entirely concur in the propriety of that law, and the construction which has been given to it by the Treasury Department that it is in full force; but a different construction had been given to it heretofore, and therefore I proposed the amendment now before the Senate.

The Senator from Michigan objects to that amendment for two reasons. He says that in the very law we pass—this being a part of the law, if we insert it—we disavow by the appropriation what is contemplated by the amendment. Not at all. This is only an amendment intending to affect future appropriations in violation of the law of 1845. It is intended, in effect, to reenact that law; and to give notice not only to the House of Representatives, but to the whole world, in the form of a law, that hereafter no other appropriations in violation of that section of the act of 1845, shall be permitted. So far as notice to the House of Representatives is concerned, certainly it does not partake of the character that has been given to it by the Senator from Michigan; because, when the House of Representatives concurs in this amendment that is proposed, it is not only a notice given to the House of Representatives by us, but a notice that the House of Representatives themselves give, and a notice that the law gives to the world, and to all the officers that are to be controlled by the action of Congress. It is a concurrence, therefore, by the two Houses, to an act of Congress in which they substantially reenact and give notice to the accounting officers—to the whole world; to the House of Representatives, to this House, and to all other persons that are to be controlled by the law—that hereafter no further appropriation shall be made in violation of that law.

That is the sum and substance of the amendment; it means nothing more than that; and it is proper, it seems to me, in this case, on account of the course that has heretofore been pursued under the law. It is not proper, perhaps, to express an opinion as to the propriety of the course pursued by the House of Representatives in making this allowance. This is not exactly the proper occasion to express my opinion on that subject. If it were, I might differ very much, indeed, as to the propriety of the allowances that have been made, but that is not the question involved here. These allowances have been made, and they have heretofore been passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury until this case arose. They have been passed, in my opinion, in violation of law; but up to the present case they have been passed. Then, under the circumstances of the case, taking all things into consideration, it appears to me that it is better to agree to this appropriation with a distinct notice, not given by the Senate to the House of Representatives, but by the concurrence of both Houses to this provision, that in future no further appropriations of this character will be permitted.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It seems to me, sir, that the section proposed to be stricken out is almost the only provision which this bill contains that makes appropriations; for a real deficiency, and that all the other provisions of the bill may rather be called by the general term of appropriations than deficiencies. This money has been paid out by the Clerk of the other House, under the authority of resolutions of that House, and under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, who had always theretofore construed such resolutions as sufficient to authorize the payment. The present Secretary of the Treasury, now in office little more than one year, is the first authority by whom that construction has been changed. He refused to allow a credit, and perhaps very properly, being of opinion that the law did not warrant it; but he, impressed with the justice of allowing it to the Clerk, who has made the payments, recommends that the appropriations be now sanctioned, and the payments authorized. Nothing seems to me to be more appropriate to this bill, and nothing seems to me to be more proper than the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, to guard against the recurrence of these inadvertencies on the part of the House of Representatives in future, and to give notice that such allowances are not considered lawful, nor such resolutions a proper authority on which to draw money from the Treasury of the United States. My own impression is that they are not; but when this has gone so far under the sanction of former precedents, and under the sanction of the House of Representatives, that the officer acting under their authority has actually disbursed the money, the question is whether the loss shall fall on the nation or fall on the innocent officer, performing his duty, as he supposed, faithfully. I cannot hesitate to say, let it fall on the Government.

But it does seem to me a little strange, Mr. President, that an appropriation, accompanied with such circumstances, should alone have attracted the attention of the honorable Committee on Finance. We know some of them to be marked by principles of economy; but all this monstrous bill, appropriating for alleged deficiencies about ten millions of dollars, is passed over, and the economy of the committee is only exhibited when they come to this miserable little item of payments, made to a small amount, to officers to the other House of Congress. Sir, I think when that committee could have reconciled themselves to the vast appropriations of the public money, amounting to nearly ten million dollars, for alleged deficits in the appropriations of the last year, this little article might have been suffered to escape, unless it was thought necessary, in the face of such unusual and unparalleled appropriations, to make some show of economy, and to select some little item for the purpose of indulging this temper of economy upon. I impute it altogether to the necessities of the case, that the gentlemen should have resorted to this little topic for the purpose of displaying their economy upon it. Let it go with the ten millions.

I know it is said that this vast and unusual deficiency has been the result of extraordinary circumstances. Well, sir, I know of but one extraordinary circumstance, and that is, that under the authority of the President an army has been marched into Utah, and at vast expense has been provisioned and is to be provisioned in the midst of the Rocky Mountains. Provisions are to be carried to them a distance of one thousand or twelve hundred miles. This is very costly. Why has it been so? Why, if this army was destined against the Mormons, was it not marched in time to accomplish its object, and avoid, to some extent, this vast expense? Why, if circumstances did not permit it to march in time, was it not deferred until it could accomplish something in the course of the next summer? Where was the necessity for this movement on the part of the Government? I agree that it is the duty of this Government to reduce to proper subjection to its laws all that live within its jurisdiction; but this is a momentous movement. What right had the executive Government, I ask, knowing that Congress had made no provision, by appropriations, to meet such an event, to incur the expense? If it contemplated, during the last session of Congress, such a movement, it ought to have been made known to Congress, and the sanction of Congress obtained by a grant of the necessary supplies. If it was not anticipated or then resolved upon, ought not the Executive, when an additional expense of $10,000,000 was to be incurred and thrown upon this Government by a military movement, to wait until Congress could have been consulted as the means of obtaining supplies and appropriations? I think so. The President, by creating a necessity for us to expend the money, has, in effect, made an appropriation of it himself. It amounts to that. He creates the necessity which renders it inevitable that we must make the appropriation. We cannot abandon our army where he has placed it; we must make provision for it; and by this very movement he has thrown upon us the necessity of this greatly increased expense. It seems to me that this is not a policy exactly conformable to the spirit of our Government. He might as well have thrown upon us in any other mode, the necessity of expense. He might as well have purchased foreign territory and left us to pay for it, without consulting us as to the purchase. That was not the course of Mr. Jefferson. Congress was first asked, "will you make the appropriation?" and it seems to me, with respect to this military movement, above all others, Congress ought to have been consulted.

Sir, these bills of deficiency are generally bills of necessity. We are obliged to pass them because the money is expended, or contracted to be expended, and the credit of the Government pledged; and now, in this case, the existence of our little army in the Rocky Mountains perhaps depends upon our passing the bill. We are hardly left free in making these appropriations of the public money. We are constrained to do it by the conduct of the Executive in the management and command of the Army. I shall yield to it; but I have thought it necessary and proper to express my opinion as to the impolicy of the course that has cast upon us this necessity. I acknowledge the necessity that now exists, and shall rather consider what is necessary to the preservation of our army in this emergency, than what is the policy which I ought to sanction in regard to this mode of action on the part of the Executive. I shall vote for the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and I shall vote for retaining the third section after it is adopted.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I do not see any difficulty in the question suggested by two or three of the gentlemen who have addressed the Senate with reference to the relative rights and duties of the two Houses. Nobody disputes the right of the House of Representatives to use their contingent fund for all their expenses during the session. It is appropriated for that purpose. But I understand this proposition to go further. The House of Representatives thought proper to make appropriations for past services rendered to other Congresses—alleged debts which had been created for some six or seven years. They cannot do it; it is illegal; and if they want to pass a law authorizing it because they approve it, there is no indelicacy in my voting against it because I do not approve it. They have no right to use the contingent fund for such purposes. It is not given to them to pay the debts of past Congresses, which they assume to exist, and then to pay. In this section, they propose to appropriate money to pay some officers, not for discharging their duties to the last Congress, but for the discharge of duties before that Congress had any existence. It presents itself to us simply in this way: is it fit to be passed? and is it fit to be passed in this way? I say, in the first place, it ought not to be passed at all; and in the second place, it ought not to be passed in this way; and therefore I shall not vote for it.

So far as the remarks of my honorable friend from Kentucky go, as to the course of the Government, I am not informed; but I have understood, from a slight intimation I have from the papers, that this money is not expended, and that this army will not be sent, unless we make the appropriations. It is not to support the army of Colonel Johnston in Utah. As far as I am informed, or as far as appears from the report of the Secretary of War, ample provision was made at the last session of Congress to send two regiments to Utah; but, on account of the hostile state of things arising since the last session of Congress, it is proposed to send three or four thousand men, who are on the frontiers, ready to march to Utah, to the assistance of those regiments sent there on the peace establishment, without reference to hostilities. If I am correctly informed from the Executive Departments, the appropriations now asked are intended to send an additional military force, in consequence of the recent hostility of the Mormons. So the question presents itself to us whether we are willing to send any such additional force out there; and the first point to be determined is, whether it is necessary or proper. If it is not, I think it ought to be voted against; and I must be better satisfied than I am now on that point, or I will not vote for it. If the Executive believes this course is necessary, and this amount of assistance should be sent—three or four thousand other troops, with their supplies—and Congress concurs in that belief, I suppose they will go; but if not, they will not go.

I understand that to be the state of the case; but it is a very bad reason against striking out an item that is absolutely wrong and improper, to allege that there may be another such. Sir, abuses cling to each other; they are all natural allies; they are all kin to one another. Get them in a bunch, and it is impossible to break them. Get forty bad things in a bill, and nobody can beat it. It brings aid of all sorts to it. My rule has been different from that of my honorable friend from Kentucky. I vote against all bad things as I come to them, whether they be small or large. Therefore I shall vote in support of the action of the Finance Committee in this case, and when I am called upon to support one branch of this Government in taking money out of the Treasury, without the Constitution, I will not do it; nor do I know that I will vote for anything else connected with it. My present impression is that I will not.

Mr. HALE. I am somewhat embarrassed about this vote; but some doctrines have been thrown out as the construction which the executive officers put on appropriation bills, which strike me as perfectly monstrous, and in contradiction to what their established practice has been on other matters. Several years ago—I do not remember exactly how long; and I am going to state from memory altogether—seeing how many appropriation bills were hurried through here at the close of the session, by which captain such-a-one, and lieutenant such-a-one, and major such-a-one, was getting his salary increased without anybody knowing anything about it, I introduced an amendment that the officers should be confined to their salaries prescribed by law, and that salaries should not be continued to be paid constantly from appropriations made in the annual appropriation bills. It passed this House, and passed the other, and became a law. Well, sir, it came very near producing a dead lock in the Government, and Mr. Whittlesey, I think, sent a communication to Congress, saying that there were so many officers receiving a salary by virtue of these side-way appropriations that it would be impossible to administer the Government without allowing it; and Congress actually repealed the law before they adjourned, and left things as they were. You may get an amendment into an appropriation bill increasing the salary of an officer, and it remains there eternally—you never can get it out; but if you put in something to diminish or restrict him, that expires with the act, and is no part of the law. It seems to me that is the way we have been going on.

Why, sir, a great many of the most important provisions of law are put on to appropriation bills as a matter of necessity, because appropriation bills will go through. There is a specific gravity that carries them right through; and anything that you can hitch on to them by way of amendment is sure to go through. Other bills you cannot get along, and the result has been that very important amendments making great reforms, some of the greatest reforms we have ever had, have been hitched on to appropriation bills. Why, sir, a law that was very much found fault with at the time it was passed, but which has proved to be one of the most salutary, wise, and humane enactments this Government ever made—that which abolished the system of flogging sailors in the Navy, was passed in an appropriation bill; and some of these martinets of the lash undertook to raise this very question upon that reform, and the question was actually argued, I think within two years, before the supreme court of Massachusetts. It was raised in an action against an officer for a violation of that law, and it was seriously contended that the amendment being to an appropriation bill, expired with the appropriations contained in the bill. My only wonder is that the court did not decide that it was so; but they did not so decide. They decided that it was a law. That was the first time I ever knew that such a construction as that was seriously maintained by anybody, that a provision of law being attached to an appropriation bill expired with the year for which the appropriations were made. If you go back, you will find that some of the most important provisions of law ever made in our Government, and some of the greatest reforms, have been, from the necessity of the case, hitched on to appropriation bills.

In regard to the particular provision before the Senate, some gentlemen are opposed to it because it carries out a resolution of the House of Representatives which goes back, and pays for services rendered to other Congresses. But, sir, I tell you, we are guilty of the same offense. This Senate, time and again, since the passage of the law of 1845, have voted money to pay their employes in direct contravention of it; just exactly as much so as this is. It is true, we did not go back, and pay back years; but we have made these extra compensations again and again; and I think, though I am for enforcing the law, that it will become us to set up our holy indignation against this violation of the law when we have been habitually violating it ourselves. More than that, sir, we shall violate it. We shall violate it again, and if we do not pass a law, and the Administration take it into their head, they will do it, and if they cannot find it in anything else, they will have a transfer of appropriation: we may pass a law to print books, and the money will be transferred to pay clerks or something of that sort, just exactly as it is known that as long as it is popular to pay these officers, they will be paid whether there is any law for it or not.

But I am embarrassed by this proposition. I understand that the last Clerk of the House, a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard—whatever may be said of him otherwise, I believe him to be as honorable and high-minded a man as ever held the office—in pursuance of the directions of the House, has actually paid out this money in good faith, honestly. Now, if we want to censure the House, I do not think we ought to do it over General Cullom's back; we had better do it directly. Last and least of all, ought the Senate to stand up and vindicate the law by stepping in between General Cullom and the accounting officers, when we ourselves have repeatedly, over and over again, violated the law, and in the direct face of this law paid our employes extra compensation since it was passed. I am opposed to the whole of it, and I have always been opposed to it. I am opposed to all illegal and extravagant appropriations; and in my opposition I have almost been like the old prophet—like one crying in the wilderness against them. Nobody has come to my rescue; nobody has stood up with me; and I feel very much embarrassed now, to be called upon for the first time to vindicate my sincerity, by punishing an innocent and honest officer for faithfully carrying out the orders of the House. In my view, that is just exactly the way in which the question presents itself to the Senate, and I do not think the fact which is insisted upon by the honorable Senator from Louisiana makes the least odds in the world; because if it was against the law to pay the employes of the last Congress, and was against the law to pay those of the preceding Congress, one was just as much a violation of the law as the other, and if we pay for the one we may as well pay for the other.

Under these circumstances, I shall vote for the original section; and I must say that I have some doubts about voting for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, for the reason that it does not seem to me to be honest. I do not mean that the Senator is not honest; but it seems to me it is like a reformed drunkard. He makes up his mind that he never ought to do the thing, and then says: "I will take this glass; but I will never drink again." [Laughter.] Such promises of amendment as that never amount to anything. If you mean to stop, stop now when the temptation is at your lips. It seems to me that the construction of the honorable Senator's amendment is that we are going to violate the law this time; but we are sorry for it, and will never do it again. I think if we have that penitence in our hearts, we had better keep it there—not make any profession of it until we are ready to put it in practice. I am rather opposed to the amendment; and as to the provision as it stands in the bill, under the circumstances, I do not say that it ought to be passed; but somehow or other I have a sort of notion that if the thing can be done, it ought to be winked at and permitted to slide, if that is the expression; and that we should not interpose in this way to punish the Clerk of the last House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I presented the objection to this third section of the House bill as briefly and as simply as I could. The objection rested on the fact that it was in opposition to law, as we believed, as the Comptroller of the Treasury has determined, as the Secretary of the Treasury has declared; and I submitted it to the Senate whether, under such circumstances, they would vote to keep in a section that was contrary to law, or whether they would strike it out.

The Senator from Kentucky has expressed his surprise that the Committee on Finance should have moved to strike out a provision which has been shown to be contrary to law. I believe nobody has maintained that it was legal; I think nobody can maintain it successfully. He has expressed his surprise that we should move to strike out that which was manifestly wrong, because, he says, there are other bad things in the bill; there are immense appropriations which are not reduced. That is to say, the committee ought to have acted on the principle of making bad worse: if there are things in the bill that are bad, they ought not to strike out others which are as objectionable, because they have not reformed the whole subject-matter of the bill; and yet, sir, when he proceeded a little way in his remarks, he himself, I think, gave the reasons why the committee should not propose to strike out the military items. He says the troops are there; we are obliged to pay them; we are obliged to send subsistence to them; we are obliged to furnish them with the means of keeping in the field, and of living and moving. If that be the case, then it was impossible that the Committee on Finance could have diminished these items; but if the Senator from Kentucky will show me how these items can be diminished safely, with a due reference to what is proper, and due to the Army, I will not only vote with him, but I will thank him for giving me the information.

But, sir, he says that we have been forced into this expenditure by the Administration. He says that the Administration, as I understand him, has acted contrary to law. Contrary to law—how? Has not the President the right and the power to post the troops? Has he not the right to move them from Leavenworth to Utah? If he found that the Governor, who was appointed by the constitutional authorities of this Government, in Utah was probably not to be allowed to exercise the functions of his office in peace, was it not his duty to send such force there as would enable him to execute the laws? Was he doing anything in derogation of law, in doing this?

Nor did he depart from the law, if he made contracts ahead of the appropriations for subsistence and transportation, for it is a matter of law that in the quartermaster's and subsistence departments such contracts may be made ahead of the appropriations. It was necessary to lodge this authority and this discretion in these departments, because emergencies might suddenly arise, rebellion, insurrection, invasion, and the President might be called upon to suppress them. He might be forced to move the troops, in order to do so; and I believe he has been forced, in the last fiscal year, to make some movements of troops in reference to Indian affairs—in reference to Indian disturbances—which cost money. If he were forced to make these movements of troops, in order to put down insurrection and rebellion, it would be essential, if the money was not appropriated, that he should have a right to contract for what should be necessary to move and to subsist them. To that extent the power has been lodged by law in the President to make contracts ahead of appropriations; but no further. Wherever it was practicable to postpone the supply until the law could be made, the authority has not been given. It has not been given for pay, and items of that sort. But this general discretion is lodged in him only in regard to matters of transportation and subsistence.

Then, sir, I say it will be difficult for the Senator from Kentucky or for any other Senator here to show that the President of the United States has transgressed any law, or exercised any authority which is not vested in him by the Constitution in simply posting the troops differently from what they were before, and ordering them to different parts of the country within his jurisdiction.

With regard to the policy of this Utah movement, I have nothing now to say. I do not propose to enter into it now. I only make these remarks by the way; for I intend, so far as I can, to confine my own remarks to the amendments as they arise. If other amendments should be offered—as doubtless they will be—which will raise these other questions on the portion of the bill which proposes to furnish military supplies, I may have something to say; but, until then, nothing on that subject.

In regard to this amendment, I have only to say that I have not the slightest feeling on the subject. I care nothing as to what the Senate may determine in reference to it. I believe that if the section was contrary to law, it was the duty of the Finance Committee to move to strike it out. If the Senate think, under the circumstances, that the allowance ought to be made, they will make it. I am not of that opinion, however, and I shall vote to strike out the section.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It is, I believe, a principle which has been invariably adopted, not only by Congress, but in all its adjudications by the Supreme Court of the United States, that where an officer in the bona fide performance of his duty has, by mistake or inadvertence, violated a law of the land, he ought to be indemnified for it. It is on that principle that many indemnities have been granted to officers; and now the gentleman from New Hampshire will see that the principle on which this Clerk is entitled to be indemnified is the very same on which, not only Colonel Mitchell was indemnified in the case of Harmony against him, but on which, from the earliest period of the Government, honest officers, acting bona fide from a sense of duty, but inadvertently in violation of a law which they did not understand, have been protected. You say that this Clerk has acted contrary to law, but he did so bona fide. He had the resolutions of the House of Representatives, the orders of the House, for his authority. In his action he was sustained by all the precedents, by all the Secretaries of the Treasury who had acted on the very case theretofore. This was the authority on which he acted. Did he act bona fide? Certainly; here is every circumstance that can induce that belief. Ought he not to be indemnified? It is a principle distinct from that on which the gentleman from New Hampshire says he has so perseveringly and so long, and with so little success, been endeavoring to confine officers to the salary the law allows them; but he has not yet acted on the principle that an officer of this Government, acting bona fide and with an intention to do his duty, who has mistaken the law, should not be compensated. He has never opposed the principle of indemnity in such cases, nor will any one here oppose that principle.

As to the other matter, sir, I have not said that the President of the United States had acted contrary to law; but, if I understand the theory of our Government, it is this: it is the duty of Congress to appropriate the public money; it looks before, and it makes in advance all the appropriations and provisions necessary for the coming year that its wisdom can anticipate. The Government sends its estimates of what it wants for the next year. Congress considers them, and Congress appropriates the sum of money which it will grant as an appropriation for the service of that year. Then, in the spirit of this system of government, ought not the President to accommodate the public service to the amount of appropriation? Is he to go on and expend that, and knowingly to create necessities for greater appropriations of the public money, and that, too, when no extraordinary occurrence has taken place?

I ask my honorable friend from Virginia, what occurrence has taken place in the last year? Was not this Mormon question exactly in the condition in which it now is? Did we not understand as well one year ago how far the Mormons were in resistance to the authority of this Government, as we do now? Congress, with all that knowledge before it, made provision for the support of our armies, and appropriated all the money it supposed was necessary. Ought not the President to consider himself under some obligation to bring that service within the revenue that had been given for the purpose of sustaining it? I think so. Can the gentleman from Virginia think otherwise?

I say, too, there has been great improvidence in placing the army in a condition where these expenses were absolutely and indispensably necessary; but whatever our opinion of the policy of placing them there, or of the propriety of knowingly and willfully involving us in the necessity of much greater appropriations than have been made, I think I may venture to say that this movement was not in harmony with the spirit of this Government, or with the legislation of Congress. It was a very important movement, involving a question of civil war. Certainly if anything deserved the consideration of Congress, it was a movement of this sort. Then all would have gone on well. We should have known what our expenses were. Now, we have $10,000,000 of additional expenditure, the necessity of which is all brought about by the act of the executive Government itself.

As to the Post Office Department, here is more than a million and a half for that in this bill. How is it accounted for? Where are the extraordinary circumstances that have reduced the Post Office revenue, or shown such fundamental error in the estimates made by that Department of its own expenses? It is calculated very much to undermine that confidence which we consider ourselves entitled to repose in official estimates, that one Department of the Government cannot come within a million and a half of the extra allowance necessary for Congress to grant it out of the public Treasury, and when the military Department cannot come within six or seven millions of the amount.

My friend from Georgia supposes that this deficiency, as it is called, is in consequence of the necessity of sending reinforcements to Utah. Well, sir, there are but two months of the year left in which these $2,000,000 are to be disposed of. What are the additional reinforcements? Three regiments of volunteers. They would not amount to anything like this sum. It is evident that the great mass of it is necessary to supply at that distant post the army now there with provisions, and the necessity of it is superinduced by the executive Government in placing the troops in that position.

I have said that it seems to me this is objectionable in point of policy and propriety, and that this great additional burden is thrown upon the nation in the time of its necessities by the will of the Executive, and Congress is only left to act under the necessity of the case and in conformity to it. This does not seem to me to be right, and I do not think that a tax of $10,000,000 ought to be imposed upon the people of this country without a word being said questioning the propriety and the policy which has led to the necessity of it. Sir, I cannot point out any error in the calculation. How could I? What have the Senate seen, of all the particulars of this bill amounting to this great sum? We rely upon the gentleman from Virginia, and I do so with perfect confidence. I know his intelligence, I am confident of his integrity, and confident moreover of his economy. I assume that all this may be necessary; and I complain of the necessity being imposed upon us. As far as I can see, there was no sufficient cause for imposing that necessity on Congress. That is my complaint. I am under a necessity—under a necessity of voting blindly and promptly too. When the fate of our countrymen, the fate of our army is concerned, I will not hesitate to make calculations; but I have a right to hold, and the people of the country have a right to hold responsible the Government that has cast upon us the necessity of voting, and upon them the burden of paying this money. That is my complaint; and I say again that it seems to me, that while the gentlemen of the Finance Committee were taking this mighty dose, it was hardly worth while for them to exercise a spirit of economy on this little infinitesimal appropriation, comparatively, to pay what I conceive to be an honest debt, to indemnify an honest public officer, who in good faith, under an authority which he deemed sufficient, has paid out some twelve thousand dollars. That is the view which I have taken of the subject.

Mr. BIGGS. To attain my object, it has been suggested that I modify my amendment so as to make it a little more effectual; and to conform to the views of gentlemen, I propose to modify it so as to read:

And provided further, That it shall never hereafter be lawful for either House of Congress to apply any part of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of such House, to any other than the ordinary expenditures of such House, nor to apply any part of said appropriation as extra pay or extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The question now recurs on striking out the third section of the bill, as amended.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 105.

and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mason, Pearce, Slidell, Toombs, Wade, and Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Biggs, Bieler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doohittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Gwinn, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, and Wilson—30.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to offer an amendment in section three, line eight; after the word "accounts" to insert:

And that there be paid to the employés of the Senate, who did not receive it at the last session, the same amounts respectively that were allowed to the employés of the House by the resolution of the House of Representatives, of March 2, 1857.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose the employés of the Senate are as much entitled to this extra pay as the employés of the House of Representatives; but I cannot, for one, vote for it in either case; and there is an additional reason why I feel bound to vote against it as an amendment to this bill. I am very anxious to keep off all amendments that add to its amount. It is important, if this bill be passed, that it should be passed speedily, and I think it would be far better to retain all other propositions for additional appropriations until the general bills come up, and let us take the sense of the Senate upon this bill which mainly refers to the military appropriation, and add nothing to what is contained in the bill by way of appropriation for other objects.

Mr. CAMERON. It seems to me that this is a proper place to put the amendment. As I understand it, some of the persons employed about the Senate were paid the extra compensation last year, and others were not. I am not particularly strenuous about this item; but there are some cases of the kind, and while we are paying off old scores, I think we ought to do justice.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think if we provide for the officers of the House, common justice would require that we should provide in the same bill and the same section, for the officers of the Senate. I voted to strike out the House appropriation, and I was willing to leave them and the officers of the Senate to share a common fate, when the two propositions were brought forward together; but if we are to provide for the House officers, and then have the Senate officers rejected in the House, I think there is an injustice as well as an impolicy in it, and it ought not to be done. For one, I am opposed to all this extra compensation. I think we should hold the two Houses to the law on the subject. If the pay we give to our officers is not enough, let us adjust their salaries fairly and properly, and increase them, if necessary; but this extra compensation is unfair, is unequal, and is unjust. But to provide for the officers of one House, and leave out the other, I think is a discrimination that is unjust and impolitic, and I really think that if the Senate are going to keep in that proposition of the House, we ought to do the same for the Senate officers. The reason given by the Senator from Virginia I do not recognize as being satisfactory; for having made an amendment to the bill already, it must go back to the House of Representatives. Why not do justice to our own officers by putting them on an equality, and then either have the whole rejected or the whole passed, and then the action will be impartial, and not subject to complaint. I trust the Senator from Virginia will offer to put the Senate officers now on an equality with those of the House, and if one is paid now, let them all be paid. If we deny it to one, deny it to both; otherwise we shall find the officers of the House provided for, and those of the Senate rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. I do not agree at all with the Senator from Illinois, that because there has been one wrong done by the House of Representatives, the Senate should do another wrong and violate the law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is not my proposition.

If the Senator listened to me, he heard me say that I am opposed to the whole concern.

Mr. BIGGS. So am I.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But why not strike out the whole proposition, instead of saying, "take it this time, but we will stop you hereafter?"

Mr. BIGGS. Some good reason may be given for that by those who voted for the appropriation in the House—what it is I do not know. I did not think that point arose in this case, and therefore did not consider that question, it having been acted on by the House of Representatives under a former law and the former practice of the Department; but the question is presented distinctly by the Senator from Illinois as to what we shall do in regard to our officers—whether we shall go on and do this additional wrong in violation of law. That is the question now presented; a totally different question from the one we have presented to us by the action of the House of Representatives. I entirely concur in the opposition to all this system of extra compensation. I think it ought not to be tolerated. But the case presented to us in the third section, was as to striking out an appropriation made from their contingent fund, which had never been questioned until this occasion. They had acted, their officers had acted, and the accounting officers had acted on the construction given to the law heretofore.

Now, sir, that is altogether a different question from originating an extra allowance to our officers here, because other officers have received this compensation under a resolution of the House of Representatives. They seem to me to be two different questions altogether. The point now presented by the Senator from Illinois is, is it right? That is the question we are to ask ourselves—is it right to make this appropriation for our officers? Whether the House of Representatives have done right or wrong, is not the question now; but this amendment involves the propriety of making the appropriation at this time. Because the House of Representatives have done wrong in making an appropriation, it is no reason at all for our doing wrong. If they are wrong, the Senate ought not to be guilty of that wrong.

I am, therefore, opposed to this amendment. Because the House of Representatives has made an appropriation which, under the circumstances, we are almost forced to recognize, and we do so, with a proviso that we will never recognize it again, that, it seems to me, is no argument at all why we should continue that wrong, and perpetrate this impropriety, by saying by our vote that we will give this extra compensation, which is wrong in itself.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina. He unquestionably saved this House appropriation by his amendment, providing that it should not be done over again. But, for that, undoubtedly the appropriation would have been struck out. That is an amendment merely to cover the point and save the House officers this time. What is that amendment worth? By law now, such allowances are illegal. We have said over and over again that they shall not be made another time. Then they go on and pay the money, and pay it on condition that the wrong shall not be perpetrated over again. Then they perpetrate it over again, and pay the money a second time on condition that it shall not be done again. After that game has been played for several years, the Senator from North Carolina comes and says, "you shall have it this time, but you shall not have it again;" knowing that it will be done next year by just such an amendment as his. It is just such amendments as his that pass it. It never could be passed but for that. If the officers of the House get this money they get it by the action of the member from North Carolina. He has devised the scheme by which they do get it. They get it in that way, and in no other way; and if we are going to stop it, we had better strike out the section.

I regard the Senator from North Carolina as responsible for passing this section of the bill and continuing the abuse. I wish to put the officers of the Senate on an equality with those of the House, and see if the House will agree to that equality. I hope that putting the Senate officers on an equality with those of the House will kill both propositions, and I wish to bring it to that test. I have got tired of this thing of saying it shall not be done over again. It is like a boy putting a chip on his head and saying, "knock it off, if you dare." His adversary does so; then he picks it up again and says to him, "now knock it off again; I will whip you if you do." It is knocked off a second time; again he picks it up, and says, "I will whip you if you knock it off again;" and so he goes on all day. We understand this game; it has been played over and over again. If we are going to stop it, strike out the section. If we do not strike it out, and do not now put the Senate officers on an equality, who does not know that, at the end of the session, we shall be told we must put in this appropriation for the Senate officers because those of the House have got it. We shall have to pay it in order to put our men on an equality with them. The whole argument, at the end of the session, on the general appropriation bill, will be, that we have paid it to the House officers, and that it is invidious for the Senate to allow its officers to be treated worse than those of the House. I trust, therefore, we shall put them on an equality, and then reject the whole concern, or pass the whole concern. I hope it will be rejected. I repeat, if the salaries of our officers are not enough, let us raise them. The extra pay for officers of the two Houses has grown to be a great abuse. New officers are appointed a few days before the end of the session, to get the extra pay of several hundred dollars. It is a system of corruption that ought to be stopped. It is favoritism and corruption, and I hope we shall lop it right off. I wish to put them on an equality in order to reject the whole; and I am not satisfied with the proposition that hereafter it shall be illegal. It is illegal all the time, and has been for years, and the system will go on, unless you stop it at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have another new idea now presented, that corruption can be cured by being a little more corrupt! That seems to be the proposition of the Senator from Illinois. It is either that, or else he wishes to defeat this altogether.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I avowed that I wanted it defeated altogether.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then those who do not wish it defeated, if the amendment is calculated to effect that object, will of course vote against the amendment which the Senator from Illinois advocates. But that was only one of the grounds on which he put it. Another ground was that inasmuch as we have passed this provision for the officers of the House of Representatives, in order to do justice we must also put the officials of the Senate on the same footing precisely. I do not see the necessity for that. I do not see the force of the argument. Nobody pretended that this was due to the officers of the House as a matter of justice. It was passed on account of the particular position in which those were placed who had paid out the money, and in order to preserve a comity which, under the circumstances, it was supposed was due to the House of Representatives from the Senate. It was owing to the very peculiar position in which we found ourselves. This course had been taken under a misapprehension of law, and certain acts had taken place under resolutions which had passed, and we were compelled either to let the Clerk of the House suffer an amount that he ought not to suffer under the circumstances, or to make his action good—not that it was particularly due to these officials, not that justice to them required that it should be done in the first instance.

I am at a loss to understand how in the world we injure the clerks, messengers, and the other officers connected with the Senate, by not giving them what they have no right to expect, simply because the same has been given to others who had no right to expect it, under the peculiar circumstances of the case. I do not admit the force of any such argument as that. It is no injury to the officials of the Senate that the officials of the House, last session of Congress, received a certain amount of money. Because they received that certain amount of money, or are to receive it, under a misapprehension of the law, that is no reason why we, who now apprehend what the law is, should proceed to vote an equal amount of money to those who are connected with the Senate. Sir, I should deem myself inexcusable in voting for this proposition. I should not have deemed myself without excuse in voting for the proposition as it existed in the House of Representatives at the time when the existence of the law was not known, or the particular provisions of it were misapprehended, and it was supposed it was right enough in the eye of the law to make such allowances; but here we have been all admitting that the law stares us in the face, that we cannot pay out of the contingent fund a certain amount of money, and yet it is proposed now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me ask the Senator if the same law does not apply to the House as to the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unquestionably.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then how could they pay this compensation, and we not be able to pay?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say they could not, but I said they acted under a misapprehension.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that they could not well have acted under a misapprehension, because I was just now informed by a member of the House from Kentucky, who has been upon the Committee of Accounts, and understands these matters, that it was first attempted to pass this extra pay in the shape of a joint resolution. It probably did pass both Houses, and the President did not sign it; and when they found they could not get it through on a joint resolution, the House of Representatives passed their resolution separately.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is new to me; I do not know how the fact is. I understand there was a bill passed, which was handed to the President at the last moment of the session, and not returned. Whether it was intentionally left unsigned by him, or whether he had not time to examine it, or what the cause was, I do not know. I have proceeded on the facts as I have understood them, and as they have been understood by everybody, that the existence of this particular provision of the law of 1845, as an operative provision of law, was not known. The Secretary of the Treasury admits it. He says himself that the construction had always been otherwise in reference to that matter, up to the time when he gave his construction.

Mr. HUNTER. The Secretary said that previous appropriations had been made, and construed differently; but the House must have known this difficulty, or else why pass a joint resolution? No doubt it was paid before, because it escaped the accounting officers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps it was because they did not want to pay it out of the contingent fund, and sent it up for our own officials, supposing that we might unite, that they passed a joint resolution. There might have been various reasons; but whatever the reason was, I take the fact as it is. I take the words of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is clearly inferable that nobody understood that this provision of the law of 1845 was operative at that time. Under that supposition, and under the peculiar pressure of the case, the Senate has seen fit to say that it would not punish the Clerk of the House of Representatives, who acted under an order of that House, in paying money to a large amount. I think that is just: it is a matter in which we have yielded; but because we have done so to save the action of an officer honestly acting, to say that we must now violate that very provision ourselves in reference to our own officials, and for the purpose simply of putting money into their pockets which does not belong to them, and which they ought not to have, simply for the reason that other people have had money which they ought not to have had, is a new rule of morality, especially in legislation.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will allow me, I did not know of it to-day, but it seems here is an express law of 1854, providing against the payment of extra compensation.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let it be read.

Mr. HUNTER. The Clerk will read it, if he pleases.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Joint Resolution to fix the compensation of the employés in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits hereof.

Resolved, &c., That the officers, clerks, messengers, and other employés in the legislative department of the Government, shall be paid an increased compensation of twenty percent. upon the compensation now received by them respectively; and the messengers of the House of Representatives shall not receive less than is allowed to messengers of the Senate of the same class; such increased compensation to commence from the first day of July, 1853; and that a sum sufficient to pay the same to the thirtieth of June, 1855, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no person whose compensation was increased by the act approved April 22d, 1854, shall be benefited by this joint resolution: And provided further, That the usual extra compensation shall not be allowed to any person receiving the benefits of this joint resolution.

Approved, July 20, 1854.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That joint resolution makes a distinction between two classes of officers. I suppose it applies to some to whom the extra compensation voted by the last House will be paid, and not to others. It was optional with the officers to take the compensation under that joint resolution or not; and I understand some did not. I was not adverting to that. I was speaking of the ground on which the committee put it, and on which the Secretary of the Treasury put it; and the Senator from Virginia will observe, that I am not now arguing the correctness of the decision of the Senate on the other point in retaining the third section. If he desires that that should be brought up again, that is one thing; but I am endeavoring now to sustain his position in putting on the officers of the Senate; and I see no occasion, therefore, for him to attempt to embarrass me by reference to action on the former vote. I am now endeavoring to sustain his views on this subject. The point he now brings forward might have had some operation on the former vote; but what I was saying, and what I still insist upon, is, that whatever we may have done, or however we may have acted, or whatever grounds there may have been for our action in reference to the payment of the amount provided for in the third section to the officers of the House under the reasoning we adopted, if we did wrong in that particular, there is no reason why we should do another wrong; and if the object of the Senator from Illinois is to destroy that by adding this to it, those who are in favor of that will hardly wish to sustain him in this amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Maine has made a very ingenious argument to save this House proposition. He knows if he can save it for the House officers now, it will be saved for the Senate officers at the end of the session. Every one knows that the Senate will not consent to put its officers in a position below those of the House—will not consent to the principle of inequality—will not consent to allow the House to violate the law of the land in paying compensation to their officers, while we are confined strictly to the law. Hence the payment of this involves the payment of the Senate officers necessarily.

The question is whether we shall stand by the law cutting off extra compensation, or whether we shall keep up the abuse. We have been saying for years, "We will pay you this time, and we will not pay you again;" and there is a salvo for each man's conscience in violating the law this time, by the proviso that we will not do it again, and yet we expect to do it by the very same means that we do it now. I desire to put the Senate officers on an equality with the House officers, and either then say that both shall pass, or both shall be rejected. There is no hope of stopping this abuse until we do reject it, and refuse to pay. There is nothing in the idea that members of the House of Representatives did not know the law when they passed this resolution. They knew it well, and devised every means on earth to evade the law. As the Senator from Virginia has explained, it is an attempt to evade the law. If the House are going to take the responsibility of paying this money on their own individual order, let them pay it themselves out of their own contingent fund, instead of coming to us and asking us to be responsible for this abuse. I wish to stop it, and there is no other way to stop it except by striking it out. Let the Senate officers be put on an equality with those of the House, and then strike out the section as amended, or if it passes, pass it for both, for we know if you pass it for one, it is an entering wedge for the other. I think we had better meet it squarely in the face.

In regard to the officer of the House who paid this money, I have as much respect and kind feeling for him as for any other man. I would not injure him, but I think we should make a rule by which we shall be governed. This extra pay is a great abuse. It is a matter of abuse in this way: towards the end of the session new officers are brought in just long enough to get the extra pay, rendering very little service at an enormous expense. I think it should be cut off. The only hope is to put the Senate and House officers together, and then strike out the whole, and let the House of Representatives know that they cannot evade the law of the land by this extravagance of expenditure.

Mr. HUNTER. I perhaps appreciate the importance of putting an end to this system of extra pay a little more than others, because I have had somewhat more experience in regard to it. I know that it is esteemed a hardship by the clerks in the Executive Departments that this extra pay should be allowed here and nothing given to them. I know that messengers in those Departments complain not only that we give so much more compensation to our officers here than to them, but extra pay besides, and they advert to the fact that the officers have a vacation, have holiday part of the year, whilst they have to work the whole year. I know this is esteemed by them a grievance, and applications have been made to me, time and again, to know if I did not think justice required us to put them on the same footing in regard to extra allowance. Unless something is done to stop it, I have no doubt (for it is in the nature of abuses to increase) that in the end we shall have applications from them too, and I do not know how long it may be before they will be granted, because it does seem to be hard that, after you have made liberal allowance for one year's services of your public officers, you shall grant extra compensation to one class and refuse it to another.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. President, I am unwilling to be placed in a false position, as probably I should be if the remarks of the Senator from Illinois were to go unanswered by me. He holds me responsible, he says, for the passage of this section of the bill, because of the amendment proposed by me which saved the section. Then the Senator ought to have opposed that amendment when it was pending. If that amendment has passed the section, and he had such serious objection to the section itself, and he saw that was to be the effect of the amendment, it was his duty to oppose the amendment, and to expose it; but not a single word did we hear from the Senator from Illinois, or from anybody else, in opposition to that amendment. I believe, at any rate, there was no vote against it; certainly I heard none when the question was put. If it was of that importance which is now attached to it by the Senator from Illinois, it was his duty to have resisted it as a matter of vast importance. But instead of resisting it, what do we find? That after it is put on without opposition from him, then, to make the wrong more glaring, he advocates putting on an appropriation for the officers of the Senate, his avowed purpose being, as he says, to kill the whole of an appropriation against law.

I do not think he characterizes correctly the intercourse between the two Houses, as I understand it, when he compares them to boys daring each other to fight—one putting a chip on his head, and daring the other to knock it off. I do not understand that to be exactly the position that the two Houses bear to each other. It strikes me as strange, being but recently here compared with the Senator from Illinois, that he should assimilate the position of the two Houses to that of two boys daring each other to fight. As has been well said by the Senator from Maine, and as I supposed, until the resolution of 1854 was introduced and read a little while ago, it was the uniform practice of the House of Representatives, from the passage of the act of 1845, to make these allowances; and they had, without question, been passed by the accounting officers up to this case. It was that consideration that moved me to offer the amendment in regard to this particular transaction.

Now, sir, I think I can compare with the Senator from Illinois or any others, in a desire, and I hope an honest desire, to curtail the expenses of this Government; but when I saw that the House of Representatives had acted upon a state of facts that existed at the time, and has ever existed since 1845, that the officers had acted upon the practice of the Government up to this time, and that the House of Representatives had passed a bill making an allowance for this extra compensation, because it became necessary for the first time, the question having been raised about its legality, I thought it was but a proper deference to the House of Representatives, having passed the law, to concur with them in regard to this matter, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and attach an additional proviso to the section, that hereafter no further appropriations for this object should be permitted. Such was my impression, not having heard of any other action of Congress on this subject at all. I have just been notified by the Senator from Virginia, and he says it has, for the first time, been brought to his attention recently, that since 1845, in regard to some of the appropriations included in this third section, there has been an express prohibition against it. I know nothing at all about that. The Senator from Illinois did not notify the Senate of it, although he was here at the time. The Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, did not seem to know anything about this joint resolution until his attention has just been called to it. I certainly knew nothing about it; and acting upon the information I had, which was the act of 1845, and the practice under it, I moved the amendment that I did. It was that, and that alone, and the consideration I have already alluded to, that influenced my action.

I will compare with the Senator from Illinois, and I will go as far as he who goes furthest, to cut off this system of extra compensations as a great abuse. I think they ought to be put a stop to at once; and I would not have tolerated this except for the peculiar circumstances of the case. Now, however, I am notified that the third section of this bill includes some officers whose compensation was increased by the joint resolution of 1854, upon the express condition that they should receive no extra compensation. That was in 1854, since the act of 1845, and my attention is now for the first time called to it. If I could distinguish, as I should like to distinguish, between the cases coming under this third section, I would exclude those officers who received additional compensation by the act of 1854; but how to arrive at it I am not prepared to say at present.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will relieve him by withdrawing the amendment after saying a word.

Mr. BIGGS. I have no objection at all to doing that; but I wish to set myself right in regard to this question, because, from the additional information that has recently been furnished here, there ought to be a distinction made in the third section between those who had their compensation increased by the joint resolution of 1854, and those others whose compensation was not increased by that joint resolution.

It was upon the supposition, and upon the information I had that it had been the uniform practice of Congress, from 1845 up to this case, to make such allowances without any question, that I introduced the amendment. I am not willing to assume the responsibility which the Senator from Illinois desires to place upon me, of winking at, or encouraging in the least degree, this abuse. I learn now that, by the joint resolution of 1854, extra compensation was intended to be cut off in regard to some of these officials. Their compensation was increased in 1854 twenty per cent. on that condition. Some of those officers come under the third section. I did not know of that before. But I should like to be informed who those persons are, so that they may certainly be stricken out of this section. It was, I again repeat, on the supposition that no other act had been passed on the subject but that of 1845, and that the Government had acted on the principle of making these allowances without question, until this case arose, that I moved the amendment. I am clearly of opinion that those included in the third section, who had their compensation increased by the joint resolution of 1854, on condition that they should not have extra allowances, should be excluded from the appropriation made to them in the third section. How to get at it I do not know, except by moving a reconsideration of the amendment that I proposed; and as I apprehend that there will not be during the day probably a vote taken on this bill, I may inquire and ascertain which of these officers had their compensation increased by the joint resolutions of 1854.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I take pleasure in saying that the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina is in perfect accordance with that estimate which I had formed of his character. I know of no gentleman in this body who is more economical and more vigilant in watching the expenditures of the Government than he is; hence, I was amazed that he should have been the person to have offered the amendment which he submitted, which above all others would tend to continue this abuse instead of stopping it. The explanation he has given that he had not seen the act of 1854, is perfectly satisfactory to me. I am convinced that he has acted in entire good faith, and that he means to stop this abuse. I am glad that such is the case; and I believe the movement he has indicated, that of reconsideration, is the true mode by which he can reach his object and mine; and, if he will help me to strike out this provision of the House bill, I will go with him against putting on the Senate amendment, and stop this abuse at once.

Mr. CAMERON. In offering my amendment, I alluded to the fact that, at the close of the last session, a resolution was offered in the Senate, directing that its officers should be paid a certain allowance. As I understand, that resolution was before the Committee on Contingent Expenses; who, on consultation, thought they had not power under the law to make the allowance, and consequently the Senate officers got nothing. Some of the people employed there, I understand, are paid some extra allowance under a resolution of the Senate for a certain time. At all events, there is a disposition on all sides to prevent, in the future, any of this extra compensation; I agree with that in principle; but I am desirous that the officers of this House should be on the same footing with those of the other House, before we commence a system of retrenchment and reform in this particular.

The resolution offered at the close of the last session included a number of laborers in the public grounds, as well as clerks and messengers here, and a portion of them were paid, and the laborers were not. My resolution was intended principally to reach that class of people who do a great deal of work and get very little pay. But in order to relieve the Senate, and especially the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I withdraw my amendment, saying also that at the close of the session I shall introduce a resolution to pay our officers in the same manner.

Mr. HALE. I have an amendment which I wish to propose as an additional section:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by any officer or agent of the Government, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and the sixth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved May 1, 1820, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest now, if the Senator from New Hampshire will excuse me, to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether, as we are getting to the disputed matter about the Army, it is not as well to let this bill go over until to-morrow, and have the papers presented this morning printed in the meantime.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVENSON] wants an executive session. Will the Senator from Maine object to disposing of this amendment if it will not take long?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will involve a debate on the whole question in reality.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state to the Senator from Virginia that I have a few words to say on the amendment. It may take me half an hour or an hour. I am ready to go on now. I would just as leave talk now as at any time.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from New Hampshire is ready to go on, probably he had better do so, and then we can lay the bill over until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My object was to let the debate subside in season to have the papers printed.

Mr. HALE. I have no choice about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Probably this amendment will involve the general debate on the whole matter.

Mr. HUNTER. Then why not let the Senator from New Hampshire open it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. For the reason that there is just so much time lost in printing. We had better order the papers to be printed, and dismiss the subject for to-day.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from New Hampshire probably will not use these papers, and we can send them to be printed at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not particular about half an hour.

Mr. HALE. Before I sit down I shall ask the Senate to give me the yeas and nays on this proposition; and I may remark that, in my judgment, the want of the provision contained in this amendment lies at the foundation of our whole difficulty. It results from the allowance of the authority which we give to the quartermaster general to make contracts without law and without an appropriation.

It is a singular fact, sir, that from the adoption of the Federal Constitution down to the year 1844, being a period of fifty-five years, this Government was administered without any deficiency bill. In 1844, for the first time, there was a deficiency bill presented in the House of Representatives, and passed, and it had a very significant preamble, which I shall read. It was entitled, "An act making appropriations for certain objects of expenditure, therein named, in the year ending June 30, 1844." It was approved June 15, 1844, and is the first bill ever passed by this Government to supply deficiencies created in the administration of the Government under the regular supplies. The first clause of that bill is in these words:

"That the following sums of money be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, for the respective objects of expenditure herein specified, being principally for arrearages or deficiencies arising in consequence of expenses improperly incurred beyond the amounts appropriated for the year ending the 30th of June, 1844, or for objects not authorized by law."

That law was passed, as it appears by the record, under the operation of the previous question, in the House of Representatives; there was no debate upon it there; but when a motion was made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance to take it up in the Senate, Mr. Haywood, then a member of the Senate from North Carolina, since deceased—

"Wishing to record his vote against this extraordinary and unconstitutional bill, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered."

"Mr. Allen called the attention of the Senate to the fact that it was after much discussion, and upon due deliberation, the House had decided upon inserting these words; and that in these expenditures the Constitution had been violated." The House, in the preamble of this bill, merely states the fact that expenditures have been improperly made, without authority of law, which nobody denied. In looking through the bill, he found it consisted of five or six items, amounting to $553,000—upwards of half a million of money applied contrary to law, and in palpable violation of the express clause of the Constitution which says no money shall be drawn out of the Treasury without authority of law. He should vote against the bill in any shape or form."—Congressional Globe, first session Twenty-Eighth Congress, pp. 682-3.

Well, sir, it seems to me, there was very great force in the suggestion that was then presented to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, at the time the proposition was first introduced to sanction this practice of the Government spending money without law, and without appropriations, and relying on the Congress of the United States to meet it. The provision of the Constitution is familiar to everybody, that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." But, do you not see, sir, and does not every Senator who hears me, see, that that provision of the Constitution is utterly nullified if you give permission to any officer of the Government to go on and pledge the public faith in advance for expenditures, and in that way create a debt which, the Congress, in order to redeem the public faith, are obliged to make appropriations to pay?

The Constitution will not give you permission to allow the quartermaster general, or the Secretary of War, or the President of the United States to put his hand into the Treasury and take out a single dollar, except by virtue of appropriations made by law. But by the operation of the section, which by this amendment I propose to repeal, you do authorize the quartermaster general to do in substance what the Constitution says you shall not do specifically; that is to say, you shall not authorize the President, or the Secretary of any Department, or any officer of the Government to take out of the Treasury a single dollar, without appropriations being made by law, while at the same time you do what is exactly equivalent—authorize him to pledge the credit of the country to any amount that he may please; and the extent to which the Constitution may be violated, the public treasure spent, and the public credit pledged in this way has no limitation at all, but rests entirely within the discretion, and the arbitrary discretion, of a subordinate officer of the War Department, to wit: the quartermaster general. On the 1st of May, 1820, Congress passed this law, which I propose to repeal:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting also, contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army or Navy, and contracts by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

Now, sir, this does not apply, as you will see, to the Secretary of the Interior, which is an office that has been created since the 1st of May, 1820; nor does it apply to the Postmaster General. Notwithstanding that act was passed as early as May 1, 1820, Congress went on and the Government went on just exactly as they had before, up to 1844; and the estimates had so tallied with the appropriations that the expenditures never outran them until 1844, when Congress was called upon to pass a deficiency bill. It was then received as an extraordinary, and by several Senators who spoke upon it, as an unconstitutional act; and it is obnoxious, in my judgment, to that censure, because it broadly nullifies the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred.

This is a discretion which has been arbitrarily exercised. I have asked one of the clerks of the Senate to prepare for me a list of the appropriations to supply deficiencies in the quartermaster's department since the peace with Mexico, so that I might see how it runs along. The first year after the peace with Mexico, that is in 1848, they wanted $5,000,000 to supply deficiencies; and I can well understand that it might have been necessary. We were then just at the close of a foreign war; the treaty had been made, and the troops were to be brought home; and there might have been a necessity for such an appropriation. In 1849 we had no deficiency bill; in 1850 we got along without a deficiency bill; but in 1851 we had a deficiency bill of $1,059,117; in 1852, a deficiency bill of $930,000; in 1853, we had no deficiency bill; in 1854, none; ditto in 1855. We got along, then, three years without a deficiency bill in this department; but in 1856, four years after the last deficiency bill for this department, there was an appropriation of $1,642,137 for its deficiencies; in 1857, $900,000; this year about $7,000,000. So you see it has been arbitrary; some years without any, then again $1,000,000; and then $1,500,000; and this year $7,000,000.

There can be in time of peace no sort of necessity for this discretion, not the slightest. I can readily conceive that such a provision as this may be convenient in time of war; and I do not know that I shall aid my proposition in the minds of the majority of the Senate when I tell them that if they pass this provision there will be no more wars created by the Executive; because, if the Executive is confined, as he ought to be confined, and as the Constitution intended that he should be confined, to appropriations made by law, and the power to make contracts without law and without appropriations is taken away from him, he cannot, by any possibility, incur these extraordinary expenditures.

It may be said that it is necessary in time of war, if it is not necessary in time of peace. I confess that it would be vastly, infinitely better if war comes upon us suddenly, if war is made upon us by any foreign Power, that the Administration should call Congress together, and should get from Congress authority to make such contracts as the emergency of the country might require, rather than this discretion should be left in the head of a Department or in any subordinate. If you do that, concede that there may be a necessity, and there may be a propriety in such an emergency as that of having extraordinary contracts made, is it not better—I appeal to every man who wants to guard the Treasury, as the Constitution intended it should be guarded by the sanction of appropriations made by Congress—is it not better that the Administration should call Congress together, and tell them of the emergency that exists, and ask for appropriations by law, rather than that this loose and indefinite discretion should be left in a subordinate of a Department to plunge us into a war, and into expenditures such as we have before us this year in the appropriation bill that is now pending before the Senate?

Just exactly as long as this power subsists, just so long it will be exercised; and just so long as it is exercised, just so long it will be increased, and the evil will go on, and contracts will be made, and the authority of Congress virtually nullified, as it is in this instance. This money will be paid, no matter what we think of the propriety of it, no matter what we think of the necessity of it, and no matter how unwise we may think the action of the Executive has been in incurring it. The public faith is pledged for it. The contracts have been made in virtue of this provision. It is $7,000,000, but if it were $17,000,000, it would be paid, because the public faith is pledged for it, and is pledged for it in pursuance of the very loose legislation that is left under the section I propose to repeal. I have not had time to look at the experience of other Governments, but I apprehend these deficiency bills will be found to be anomalies in any Government regulated by law. I do not know how the fact is, and I speak without the book on the subject; but I venture the remark, that you will not find bills of this character introduced and passed in the British Parliament. You will find that the British House of Commons watch the Treasury there with a scrutiny and a fidelity which ought to put Congress to the blush, and ought to bring the blush of shame upon us. Why, sir, every estimate in the appropriations is made with the utmost particularity, and column by column with the estimates which the Government asks this year, are placed the pounds, shillings, and pence that were spent for the same object last year, and that to a minutiae that would be deemed altogether impracticable here.

But, sir, the manner in which the public treasure of this country is spent under the sanction of Congress now, is just exactly that discretion which the Executive chooses, and nothing more. In the first place, our appropriations are made with a looseness that I do not know how to characterize—with a looseness that seems to be an invitation to profligacy. There are nothing like specific appropriations. Look them up and you will find fifty or a hundred different articles as diverse from one another as tropical heat from polar snows, brought together in one general conglomerated section, and for that, one, two, three, four, or five million dollars are appropriated, and it is left to the Executive to apportion it as he may. That is not all. In addition to that, they have a doctrine of transfers by which, when appropriations thus loosely made are not wanted under that general head, they may be transferred to another, and the law still observed in its terms.

I brought to the observation of the Senate, the other day, in the preparation of certain surveys, an instance of that. An appropriation was made for running the boundary line between this Republic and Mexico, and it turned out that $100,000 had been appropriated more than was wanted. That is not strange. We generally appropriate a good deal more than that over and above what is necessary; but it was strange that there happened to be an officer who did not spend it all—and he actually brought home $100,000 out of the amount he was authorized to spend. I think that ought to be set down to the credit of that man. If he is in the Army, I would brevet him. I think he deserves a brevet much more than the man did for whom, I think, we were tricked out of a brevet the other day, when we breveted him because he was to command the army in Utah; and as soon as he got the brevet the Administration sent out somebody else. I think the man that brought home the $100,000 deserved a brevet. The money was appropriated to run a line; and then he said it might very well be used in drawing engravings and delineations in natural history and natural science, &c. Very probably it might; but, instead of coming to Congress—who were the only power that had a right under the Constitution to say how the $100,000 should be spent—he went to the Secretary of the Interior, and said, "I have saved $100,000 in running the line, and I think it would be very well to spend it in pictures to ornament a book;" and the Secretary says, "very well; you shall have it." The Secretary of the Interior, without saying a word to Congress, by a mere dash of his pen, appropriated $100,000, which we had appropriated to run a line, to make a picture-book.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. What Secretary?

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Interior, under the last Administration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Mr. McClelland?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; but I do not want to say anything invidious against Mr. McClelland. I believe it is the fashion, it is the common order, it is the construction which is put upon this provision of the Constitution, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law; to transfer appropriations from one head to another, make them so loose in the first place, that they mean nothing, and then, by transfers, make them to mean, if possible, less than nothing; and then, in addition to all these loose appropriations, and these transfers from one head to another, here comes in this sweeping clause by which the Secretaries of the War and of the Navy Departments, without any limitation, without any direction, without any law, without any appropriation, may go on and pledge the credit of this Government to an indefinite extent. They have done it this year to the amount of $7,000,000. We should have to pay it were it $17,000,000; we should have to pay equally any amount they had contracted for; and we should be bound until we come back and place ourselves where the Constitution places us, as the guardians of the public Treasury, and execute, as I think we are bound in honor and in honesty to execute, that provision of the Constitution which says, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except in consequence of appropriations made by law.

That discretion rests in us, and I contend that we cannot consistently with our obligations to the Constitution, transfer this power of watching, this trust of guarding, this duty of taking care of the public Treasury. We cannot throw it from our hands upon any other officer where the Constitution has not placed it; but by the sixth section of this act of 1820, we do broadly say to the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, "you can more safely and more properly judge what sums can be drawn from the Treasury than we can; and although the Constitution forbids us in express terms from letting any of you or all of you combined, with the President at your head, put your hands in the Treasury and take out a dollar, yet we can get around that provision, and we will allow you to go on and pledge our credit, ad infinitum, for untold millions upon millions, and pledge the public faith, and then we shall keep the word of the Constitution, because the money will not actually go, until we make an appropriation by law." But it is only the word of the Constitution; the spirit of it is broken; the spirit of it is utterly broken, and in my humble judgment—I say it with great deference—we are false to our trust; false to that obligation which the Constitution has imposed upon us to guard the Treasury, when we by law permit any officers of the Government to pledge the public credit and the public faith to any amount, and then after it is done, there is nothing left but a mere matter of form that we pass the bill, because the public faith is pledged, and that binds us. It binds us just as firmly and just as strenuously as any provision of the law, or any provision of the Constitution; because I take it there is nothing that we would not sooner see violated than the public faith, the public credit, and the public honor, and when we let a public officer use and pledge that faith, that credit, that honor, we do in substance permit him to put his hand into the Treasury in violation of the Constitution.

Sir, if you want to bring the Government back to what it ought to be, a Government of law—if you want to preserve the expenditures where the Constitution intended they should be preserved, to appropriations—you must repeal that section of the act of 1820. Until you repeal that, these abuses will exist; they will increase; and these deficiency bills will come upon us year after year, and increasing, until they will reach to such an excess that the very necessities of the Treasury will compel us either to repeal the law, or to repudiate the public faith. It is because I would avoid such a result as that, that I hope this section will be stricken out.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Georgia, I understand, desires an executive session.

Mr. STUART. I withdraw the motion. The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time engaged therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 19, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. G. D. CUMMINS, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

STENOGRAPHER TO A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to suspend the rules, to enable him to report the following resolution from the select committee:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances connected with the sale and purchase of property at Wilkins's Point, New York, by the Government, for fortification purposes, in the year 1837, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at the usual compensation.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to inquire how the committee have been getting along so far without a stenographer? They have been in session for some time.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would it be in order to substitute the word "pay" for "employ?" I suppose they have employed a stenographer long ago.

Mr. LETCHER. That is what I want to know.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House yet. The motion is to suspend the rules, to enable the gentleman to offer the resolution. Does the gentleman propose to submit the resolution as a report from the committee?

Mr. FLORENCE. I was directed by the committee to submit it. I will say, if the House will permit me, to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee, who have interrogated the Chair, that it is impossible for the committee to discharge its duties unless this resolution shall be passed. I will say further, to be candid, frank, and honest—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave to make an explanation of the resolution. Is there any objection?

Mr. LETCHER. I hope that the House will hear the gentleman.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Have the committee a clerk now?

Mr. FLORENCE. They have the services of a phonographic reporter; and I think that the gentleman from New York, and all others, will agree with me that they have no right to his services or that of anybody else, without compensation. I do not suppose that any gentleman will stand up here and say that we ought to have the services of a person without paying for them.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] asks me whether we have not a reporter. We have a gentleman who is performing the duties of a reporter. The labors of the committee have been more extensive than we had any reason to suppose they would be. The testimony is voluminous in its character, and cannot be reduced to writing without the assistance of a reporter. I am directed by the committee to offer that resolution. I ask that it may be adopted, in order that the committee may be enabled to discharge the duties imposed upon it.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his committee have undertaken to employ a reporter on their own hook, and now come here and ask us to foot the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh no! that is a mistake. The gentleman from Virginia is generally right, but he is wrong this time. They did no such thing.

Mr. STANTON. The committee which the gentleman from Pennsylvania represents on this occasion, happened to occupy the same room with the tariff investigating committee, and it availed itself of the services of the stenographer, or phonographer, (or whatever he is called,) of the latter committee, in anticipation that the House would compensate those services. I know that no committee which takes voluminous testimony can transact its business without such a reporter; and I take it that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] chairman of the Fort Snelling committee, and those who are and have been on committees compelled to take oral testimony, will acknowledge that a reporter is an absolute necessity for those committees.

Mr. FLORENCE. This is not a clerk to be paid a per diem, but a phonographic reporter, to be paid a reasonable price per folio. We desire that the testimony which we have heard may be written out verbatim; and it is for that reason that we ask the compensation of a reporter. I imagine the amount paid for those services will be very inconsiderable, compared with their value. We do not want a clerk, and this resolution does not ask for a clerk, but for a stenographer, to take down testimony as it is uttered; and I trust sincerely that the House will adopt the resolution without objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that this resolution authorizes the committee to employ a reporter at the usual compensation. Now, for my own information, and the information of the House, I would like to know what that usual compensation is. All similar resolutions this session have provided for the payment of the usual compensation. What is it?

Mr. FLORENCE. I cannot answer that question. There is a fixed rate of compensation. It is very small, I know, compared with the value of the services rendered.

Mr. STANTON. It is governed by the pay to the Globe reporters.

Mr. SEWARD. I oppose this resolution, first, for the reason that I think there is no necessity for a clerk, and next, because it is a waste of time to pass it, as the House, the other day, insisted that resolutions of this sort had no obligatory force upon the House itself. A large number of members decided against allowing this kind of compensation. They decided, in effect, that such resolutions were not honorably binding upon the House. I want to test the sincerity of gentlemen, and see whether they will vote for this resolution under the circumstances.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 27.

Mr. SEWARD demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, the main question ordered to be put, and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bills:

An act (S. No. 41) to provide for the location of certain confirmed private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 242) for the relief of John Brest, a soldier in the war of 1812;

An act (S. No. 249) to release to the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company the interest of the United States to a certain parcel of land;

An act (S. No. 253) for the relief of F. M. Gunnell, passed assistant surgeon in the Navy;

An act (S. No. 256) further explanatory of an act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act for the relief of Adam D. Stewart and of Alexander Randall, executor of Daniel Randall;

An act (S. No. 261) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 262) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Richard D. Rowland, deceased, and others;

An act (S. No. 264) confirming to Alexander Copeland title to four hundred and eighty acres of land in Sonoma county, California; and

An act (S. No. 270) for the relief of T. Hart Hyatt;

In which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate have passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson;

A bill (No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana; and

A bill (No. 113) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled:

An act (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana;

An act (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki;

An act (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson; and

An act for the relief of Major Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had approved and signed an act for the relief of the legal representatives of James Lawrence.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the police bill.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion until I can submit a resolution.

Mr. GOODE. I will hear the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the States and Territories be called for bills, of which notice has been given, for the purpose of reference, and resolutions which shall not be objected to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object. We have had resolutions of that kind, and resolutions under it, of any account or consequence, have been objected to, and kept out. If the gentleman will leave out the words "resolutions objected to," and let all resolutions come in alike, I will vote for his resolution.

Mr. GOODE. I do not yield for the resolution.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 71.

Mr. STANTON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill for the establishment of an for the District of Columbia, on which general debate was closed at the rising of the committee, at its last sitting, and on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] was entitled to the floor for one hour under the rules: the pending question being to amend by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] for the Senate bill.

Mr. GOODE. The few suggestions which I propose to offer, will be presented in as brief a form as possible. I have no essay to publish, and if I had the force of character and the power of language to engage the attention of the committee, I should not indulge in political declamation. I shall direct myself to a just consideration of the merits of the propositions before the committee. The discussion upon this subject, which was opened some days since, has taken a wide range, and gentlemen have felt themselves called upon to launch out in a wild discussion of partisan politics. I shall not follow their example. I desire to call back the attention of the committee to the question which is pending before it. That question is, as was announced by the Chairman, on the adoption of the substitute which I proposed in lieu of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD.] The committee may, perhaps, be familiar with the difference between them. The general provisions of the two bills are nearly identical. They provide for the same force, for the same number of officers, and for nearly the same expenditure of money. I may, however, be permitted to state that the substitute which I introduced contemplates a less expenditure of money than the proposition of the gentleman from New York, and, pro tanto, is less objectionable.

There is, however, in one or two respects, a wide difference between the proposition of the gentleman from New York, and that which I have had the honor to submit. My substitute provides for that which I hold to be a great improvement in the administration of justice in this city. It provides for establishing a court by which offenders arrested may be summarily disposed of, instead of subjecting the country to the expense of a criminal prosecution in all cases of arrest, and instead of allowing the criminals the opportunity of securing their acquittal by the absence of witnesses after a few months' delay. This feature of the bill is of the utmost importance. More than one hundred thousand dollars are appropriated annually from the Federal Treasury for the prosecution of these petty offenses in the District of Columbia, a great portion of which will be saved by the adoption of the proposition I have submitted. In this respect I claim the credit for my bill over that of the gentleman from New York.

But the chief distinction between the two propositions is in the mode of appointment of the officers. The gentleman from New York proposes to constitute a board of commissioners to organize this police force. That board of commissioners is to be elected by the voters of the city of Washington. They are not only to be elected, but they are to be elected from the contending political parties in equal numbers. The board is to consist of two Democrats and two Americans. As I said before, when I addressed the House, the antagonistic elements of such a force would be such as to make a decision upon any question which may arise in the board utterly impracticable. It is impossible that they can enter into any regulations, or agree upon any appointments, any more than could the gentleman from New York and myself compromise on any such mode.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not know that the best governed cities and villages in America, to-day, are those governed by men chosen without reference to party?

Mr. GOODE. I do not. It appears to me utterly impracticable for that board to agree upon anything. They have to determine upon the appointment of the officers. In cases which would require prompt action, they would be without the hope of agreement among themselves. I confess it appears to me the most unreasonable proposition that could be submitted. There is no precedent like it in the history of the country. It resembles nothing so nearly as the triple-headed Cerberus, placed by mythologists to guard the gates of hell. The proposition of the gentleman from New York cannot, I think, receive the approbation of the members of this committee. If it does, it will entail a greater evil upon this city than that which it now labors under. My proposition varies from his, in varying the mode of appointment. Mine provides that the chief of police shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the Constitution of the United States provides. Gentlemen say that these officers are not Federal officers. Why not? They are created by act of Congress, are paid out of the Federal Treasury, and have their duties prescribed by act of Congress. How, then, can any officers be more of Federal officers than they are? And if they be Federal officers, the Constitution gives the appointment to the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is true that Congress has the power by law of vesting the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, without placing him under the necessity of going for confirmation to the Senate; and also of vesting the appointment of inferior officers in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. With these exceptions, however, we have no right to vest the power of appointment elsewhere.

The Constitution, I say, places the power of appointment regularly in the President. Will any man deny that this appointment of chief of police of this city is incidental to the executive power? Our ancestors, in framing the Federal Constitution, adopted the British Government as its model, and, according to the British Constitution, the power of appointment is in the Executive. It is a kingly prerogative, a prerogative of the Crown, and it is a reflection on the person of the monarch to attempt to infringe upon that power. Gentlemen may say that this is a royal attribute; if it be, it is one in accordance with the principles of our own Constitution. Gentlemen may say it is wrong to accumulate power in the hands of the Executive. It may be wrong for aught I know; but whenever an office is created by act of Congress, the Constitution vests the power of appointment, when not otherwise vested, in the President of the United States. He has the power to appoint all the superior officers of the Government, the officers of the Army and Navy, of the judiciary of the United States, and would it not be absurd to refuse to intrust him with the power of appointing the chief of police of the city of Washington?

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to know whether, under the act of 1850, the commissioners were appointed by the President, or by the courts of the District, in which they were to act?

Mr. GOODE. Did not the gentleman hear me say that Congress had the power to provide by law for the appointment of inferior officers by the courts or heads of Departments? That was the position I announced. I do not recollect particularly the provisions of the bill to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BLISS. I would like to be enlightened on one point, for it is an important one. I understand the gentleman to claim that the officers of this District are Federal officers under the Constitution?

Mr. GOODE. The officers of the corporation are municipal officers; but it is competent for Congress to create other officers in this District that are not municipal officers, and that are, of necessity, Federal officers.

Mr. BLISS. I ask whether, under the Constitution, any difference was made between any of the local officers of the District, such as Mayor and policemen, or any other officer?

Mr. GOODE. The office of Mayor is an office elective by the people, under the charter. That of chief of police is regulated by this bill. If it were a municipal office, it should be one elective by the people; if it be not, then the appointment vests in the Executive of the nation. We may, by law, provide for the appointment by the Secretary of the Interior, or any other head of the Department or the courts; but, if there be no such special provision, then the appointment attaches, ex vi termini, to the President of the United States.

Gentlemen may insist that it is wrong to invest the President with the appointing power of this chief of police, while he has the appointing power of all the principal officers of the Government. It seems to me to be a strong illustration of the proverb, "strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." I call upon gentlemen to stand by the provisions of the Constitution; I call upon them to remember by whom it was framed. I call upon James Madison to answer these objections. I call upon Alexander Hamilton, upon Robert Morris, upon Gouverneur Morris, upon James Wilson, upon Charles Pinckney, upon Pierce Butler, to answer them. I call upon Benjamin Franklin and upon George Washington to answer them. All these great men declared that it was right and proper and just and safe to vest the appointing power in the President of the United States.

Sir, what are the objections urged against thus vesting the power of appointment in the Chief Magistrate of the nation? Those objections are, for the most part, founded on personal opposition to the Executive. I am proud to say that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] was an honorable exception to the rule. I was surprised to hear such objection to a man like James Buchanan, who has spent his life in the virtuous exercise of his social faculties and of his duty to the country, and whom the people have elevated to his present high position. I was pained to see him made a mark for attack and vituperation and denunciation, if not slander, by honorable gentlemen on this floor.

Let me say, sir, that any gentleman who brings himself into comparison with James Buchanan as a man of virtue, honor, intelligence, and distinction, will be apt to suffer severely by that comparison. The objection to placing this power in the hands of Mr. Buchanan is, that he is unworthy the confidence of the country, and that he is the head of a rotten and repudiated Administration, to use the elegant language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMBS.] Gentlemen must recollect that before Mr. Buchanan was chosen the standard-bearer of the Democratic party, he was free from all these unjust imputations; but since we made him our leader and standard-bearer, and placed him in the eminent position which he now occupies, he has become the great mark for the shafts of his enemies, and I ask his friends now to shield him from these attacks. I do not ask the House to pass an improper law; but, in deciding this question of the appointing power between the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] and myself, I ask the Democracy of the House to protect the President from the obloquy which is attempted to be cast upon him. Gentlemen can vote for my proposition in preference to that of the gentleman from New York without being committed to my proposition. It is a mere expression of preference between the two propositions. The question will subsequently come up between my proposition and the Senate bill, and then upon the passage of which ever of those bills shall be preferred.

It was argued by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that the charter of the city of Washington had vested the power of appointment in the Mayor of the city, and that we could not now exercise it without a usurpation of power. I confess I was surprised to hear such an argument from that honorable source. It is true we have organized a municipal corporation here in the city of Washington, with power to accomplish municipal objects by the appointment of their officers. But can it ever have been conceived that by such an act we had deprived ourselves of the power of self-protection and self-preservation by the creation of officers for ourselves! Sir, the authority of the municipal government is concurrent, and concurrent alone, and cannot be regarded as by any means exclusive. Is there any part of this broad Confederacy in which we have not concurrent jurisdiction with the local authorities? Go to the States, sovereign States, invested with supreme authority; they exercise supreme jurisdiction upon the subjects confided to them; yet we exercise concurrent constitutional jurisdiction on all subjects confided to the Federal Government within the limits of the States. They are sovereign and supreme; yet we share the authority with them. I have seen the illustrious John Marshall in the same room, and in the same seat, administering Federal law on one day, when on the preceding day the same seat in the same room was occupied by the Chancellor of Virginia. We have concurrent jurisdiction within the limits of the States which are sovereign and supreme; yet by the creation of a petty corporation within the limits of the District of Columbia, it is insisted that we have deprived ourselves of all power of self-protection. We have no right to divest ourselves of the power to protect the Government of the United States and all those who legitimately claim its protection. We are bound to protect members of Congress, to protect the property of the Government, to protect all who are connected with the Federal Government, to protect citizens who resort here, and to protect the ministers of foreign courts. These are obligations of such a nature that Congress cannot divest themselves of them if we would; and if they had invested the municipal authorities with the power instead of themselves, the act would have been simply nugatory.

Sir, it has been objected that this Government should not support the police of the city to the relief of the citizens of Washington. This argument must be respected, because it is urged by respectable gentlemen. In itself, it seems to me to be utterly without foundation. Why is a police essential here? Is it not an undeniable fact that the lawlessness which prevails here is occasioned by the presence of the Federal Government? Do we not congregate and assemble within the ten miles square of this District the ruffians who set society at defiance? Is it not true—I put it to the calm understanding of the members of the House—that if you should remove the seat of Government to a point distant from Washington, this city would subside into the quiet and peacefulness of a country village? If, then, it be true that we occasion the necessity for a police, it is our duty, under the Constitution of the country, to provide it. The Government of the United States was brought here designedly and deliberately, and invested with power to protect itself. It was the purpose to exclude all other jurisdiction. That was the purpose for which the seat of Government was located where it is.

Every gentleman present must be familiar with the history of Washington and its establishment as the seat of the General Government. It will be remembered that at the close of the revolutionary war, when our arms were triumphant, when victory had perched upon our banner, when the power of Great Britain had been overcome, and she was compelled to abandon her possessions, when the American army achieved a glorious triumph, it was left in a condition of destitution. The soldiers were compelled to retire to their homes, not only without a cent of pay, but with their garments all tattered and torn. They had been disbanded without any settlement of their accounts. They grumbled, and exhibited every evidence of dissatisfaction; and great address was required on the part of the Commander-in-Chief to prevent a mutiny in the army. General Washington exerted his patriotism, and restored peace, by his efforts, to the great body of the army. At Lancaster, Pennsylvania, however, the portion of the army there could not be appeased. The soldiers there were in a state of utter destitution, and they took up the line of march for Philadelphia, where Congress was in session. Congress appealed to the municipal authorities for protection, and the municipal authorities referred it to the State authorities. Why was this? Because there was no adequate power in Congress to protect itself.

It will be seen that violence would be done before any protection could be afforded. General Washington was full of indignation. He dispatched fifteen hundred men to quiet the rebellion. The mutinous soldiers surrounded the House in which Congress was sitting, clamoring for pay for their services, and Congress was compelled to disperse. Before dispersing, they made an agreement to assemble at Princeton. Then it was determined that the seat of Government should be established where the Federal Government would have the power to protect itself. Shall we forget the teachings of experience, or shall we, in furtherance of what was then done by Congress, agree to this measure of necessity for the protection of members of Congress in the discharge of their duties? Early in the proceedings of the constitutional convention, a resolution was adopted, which may be found in Elliot's Debates. It provided for the insertion into the Constitution of a clause to provide for the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government over its own seat of Government; and when the Constitution was reported, the clause for exclusive jurisdiction, as it now appears in that instrument, was found inserted. It was put there in obedience to the public sentiment at the time. It was put there because it was seen that it was indispensably necessary that power should be placed in the hands of the General Government to protect itself. Virginia had jurisdiction of the other side of the Potomac river, and Maryland of this, and they ceded that jurisdiction to the United States. The General Government required the surrender of eminent domain, and Virginia and Maryland both retired. This afforded power to the General Government to protect itself; and I cannot believe that it is the judgment of the American people to yield up this necessary power, but that it is, on the contrary, an imperious duty to retain it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] provides in his proposition for the creation of a commission, to be elected by the people here; and in the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEITER] the creation of a like commission is provided. In the latter bill, two persons are named who are candidates for Mayor, and this has, of course, an appearance of a party character, which gentlemen seem so much to wish to guard against. I have already, however, given my reasons why neither of these propositions should be adopted. Other gentlemen, however, wish to invest this power of appointment in the Mayor of the city of Washington. Look at it. The Congress of the United States and the President of the United States dependent for protection on the Mayor of this city! The efficiency of such an arrangement we have already seen, and the argument of experience is against it. It has been shown in the bitter lessons of the past that he is not a person to be invested with this authority. But while some gentlemen have leveled their darts at the present incumbent, I say the organization is itself vicious; that it invests the recipient of office with power to appoint men to office who have the power to reward him by votes. Appointment by the Mayor is the most objectionable mode. The men called upon to perform the service have the power to elect the Mayor, and the Mayor, in return, has the power of paying them for their votes.

Mr. Chairman, I am nearly brought to the close of the few remarks I intended to submit. When I originally undertook to explain the provisions of this bill, this House will bear me witness that I came forward coolly and deliberately to explain these provisions. No particle of passion, no indication of excitement, was manifested upon my part. I was content to relate simply the provisions of the bill, and to call upon the House from a sense of duty to carry these provisions into effect. I desired to appeal to no party spirit at all, and I appealed to no excited feeling upon the part of any member of this House. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COMINS] rose in his place, and immediately launched out into a boisterous discussion of party politics. He felt it to be his duty, after discussing the question of police, to arraign and denounce the President of the United States, to arraign and denounce the Cabinet of the President, to denounce them as rotten and untrustworthy, to denounce and threaten the Supreme Court of the United States; to make palpable allusion to the venerable Chief Justice of this country; to denounce—

Mr. COMINS. I beg to correct the gentleman from Virginia. In speaking against this bill, I made no allusion to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the venerable Chief Justice of that court. I said justice was at fault in this city through the inefficiency of the criminal court of this District, more than from the remissness of the police in the discharge of their duties. I in no way assailed Judge Crawford, but alluded to the inefficiency of his court. Neither did I allude to the Cabinet of the President; but I did allude to his administration.

Mr. GOODE. I beg pardon of the gentleman; I thought he or some of his compere made allusion to the decision in the Dred Scott case. I then absolve the gentleman. I absolve him quo ad hoc; but by his own confession he alluded to the court of this District. He assailed the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and indelicately alluded, by name, to the honorable gentleman who presides in that court; he introduced him to the observation of the country by name. That is to be found in his printed speech. Not only in the heat of debate, but deliberately in publishing his remarks, he introduced the name of Judge Crawford to the animadversion of the American people. I have no personal acquaintance with Judge Crawford. He has not approached me, or placed me in possession of any facts, in order to make his defense here to-day. But other gentlemen, disconnected with him in party politics, men of undoubted standing, men at the head of the bar, have felt it their duty to wait upon me to show me that I was authorized to introduce that gentleman here as an amiable man, an accomplished gentleman, and a pure, just, and upright judge. That is the testimony of men opposed to him in politics, of men whose good opinion is worth cultivating by all gentlemen. And when the grave closes over him, his memory will be revered in this community.

Gentlemen refer to the case of a member of Congress who was tried here for murder a few years since, and who was acquitted. It was far from my purpose to bring that matter into this discussion. No man could have regretted the occurrence more than the unfortunate gentleman himself—no one more than his intimate friends. But, sir, he committed himself to the laws of his country, and that country declared him entitled to an acquittal, and he was accordingly discharged. I understand that the ruling of the judge, on that occasion, was that in a case of mutual combat, where the jury believe that the circumstances were such as to justify the prisoner in a well-grounded apprehension that his own life was imperiled, or that he was in danger of great bodily harm, homicide is justifiable. I hold that to be the law in most of the States of this Confederacy. I believe that that has been decided years ago as the law.

Other gentlemen have followed the gentleman from Massachusetts in the bitter war of politics. I do not propose to follow them. They may be satisfied with the exhibition they have made of themselves. I leave them to enjoy that satisfaction. I call upon gentlemen to rise superior to the little views and dissensions of party and to discharge their duty to the country and the Constitution.

For myself, I will say, that I have, perhaps, as little personal interest in the passage of this bill as any member of the House. I am rarely abroad under circumstances of exposure, and besides, I feel always safe in the security of my own heart.

Mr. COMINS. Is amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Goode] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Donn], in lieu of the original bill. The bill will now be read by sections, and will be open for amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I propose to insert after the words "one hundred men," in the ninth line, the words "all of whom shall be citizens of the United States."

Mr. GOODE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MILLSON. I propose to offer an amendment here, and perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky had better wait and submit his proposition as an amendment to mine. I wish to submit an amendment to strike out the whole of that section; but if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky be adopted now, it would not be in order to move to strike out anything which the House inserts. The gentleman can afterwards attain his object as well.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Virginia is going to move to strike out the whole section, my amendment will come first.

Mr. MILLSON. If the gentleman will allow my amendment to be read, he will see that his object can be attained after my proposition shall have been voted on.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. But the gentleman is perfectly conversant with the parliamentary rule, that if you propose to strike out, it is in order first to amend the part to be stricken out, and that then the proposition to strike out can be voted on.

Mr. MILLSON. It will save two votes.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment fails, it will still be in order to amend the original text.

Mr. MILLSON's amendment was then read, as follows:

Strike out the following:

"And for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief, at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain, at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants, at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men, at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And to aid in the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief, at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain, at an annual salary of $1,200, two, three, or four lieutenants, as may from time to time be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, at an annual salary of $800 each, thirty men, at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly; and at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, such additional number, from time to time, not exceeding seventy, at a like compensation, as shall make the whole number equal to the number employed for like purposes by the city of Washington."

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, whether there be any obligation upon Congress to establish a police force for the city of Washington, I need not determine; but there is at least a propriety in our contributing some assistance to preserve the public peace and property here, for reasons which have been explained by gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate. The presence of Congress here, the large number of public officers, foreign ministers, their families and servants—all these seem to make it proper that some aid should be contributed to the authorities of the city in maintaining order here. But, sir, I am not willing that the people of the United States shall assume upon themselves the whole burden of establishing a police force for the city of Washington. We now employ thirty men as an auxiliary guard. I propose, by this amendment, to retain that guard; retaining, however, the authority of Congress over them, and putting them under the control of officers of our own appointment. And then, I propose to allow a sufficient number, in addition to the thirty, to be called into the public service, as may equal the whole number contributed by the city of Washington.

Sir, if we establish a guard here of one hundred men, the corporation of Washington will disband their guard altogether, because they have no need of more than one hundred men, and very rarely have need of as many as a hundred. We would then be at the charge of supporting the whole police establishment of the city of Washington. Sir, there are times when the city is quiet and orderly. During the recess of Congress, there is rarely occasion for an extraordinary police force here. It is only during the session of Congress that this disorder exists.

Now, sir, this provides for a sort of sliding scale. The Secretary of the Interior, when forty men are called into the service of the city of Washington, will employ forty men for the United States. If one hundred men are wanted altogether, the city of Washington will appoint fifty, and the Government of the United States the other fifty. In this way, we shall have a force proportioned to the exigency; and I, for one, am not willing to establish a permanent guard of one hundred men, to be supported by the people of the United States exclusively, when there may be no occasion for their services. It will be observed—and this I prepared before the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky a day or two ago, though I felt the force of the suggestion—that this guard is intended not for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, but simply to aid in their enforcement. They are not to be under the control of the municipal authorities at all. This is a Federal force. You employ already a body of watchmen, thirty or forty in number. They have charge of the public buildings. They are not under the control of the authorities of Washington, nor ought they to be. And I wish, therefore, that the force which we contribute to the public services shall be under the control of Federal officers, giving such assistance to the police of Washington as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. GOODE. I am opposed to the amendment. In my opinion, it would be fatal to the bill. My colleague proceeds upon the assumption that the Government of the United States shall furnish no stronger police force than shall be furnished by the municipal authorities at Washington. Sir, suppose the municipal authorities of Washington appoint no police force at all: the exigency exists for the presence of a force; the municipal authorities may get into controversy and fail to appoint a force; the proposition of my colleague, in that case, will prohibit the Government of the United States from protecting itself at all.

Mr. MILLSON. You will have thirty men. Mr. GOODE. That number would be quite inadequate. But again, my colleague proposes to give to the Secretary of the Interior the absolute right to dismiss these officers, not because of any alleged impropriety of conduct, but because he may determine when the public service requires the force. Who would consent to take the position under such circumstances? It appears to me that the amendment is altogether defective, and I hope it will be rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia:

"Said officers and men shall all be citizens of the United States when employed in this service."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment which, I understand, my colleague is willing to accept. It is to come in after word "Washington."

Mr. GOODE. I could not accept it now, as the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MILLSON] is pending. I would be willing to accept it as an amendment to my bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is now an amendment pending to the first section of the bill, which must first be disposed of.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Chairman, it is in order, I believe, to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. I indicated the other day in some remarks which I made on this bill, two points upon which, in my opinion, the bill needed amendment, and upon which amendments had not been proposed by any member of the committee. One of these points, I am happy to say, has been met by the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and for that amendment I shall most cheerfully vote. The other point will be met by the proposition I now offer. I move to strike from the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, the words, "the police regulations of the city of Washington," and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "such of the laws of the District of Columbia and police regulations of the city of Washington as are or shall be in force for such protection." I stated the other day that my object in offering this amendment would be to relieve the Federal Government from any concern or responsibility for the local police regulations of the city of Washington; that at least that portion of the police appointed and supported by the Federal Treasury may not be implicated in the local affairs of the District of Columbia further than is absolutely necessary. Now I take it that if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia prevails, we are to have simply an auxiliary force, and that we are not to relieve the people of this District from all responsibility for their own government, or from all the expense of enforcing their own laws. We are to furnish them such aid and assistance as may be required on the principle indicated by me the other day, and indicated again to-day by the gentleman from Virginia.

It seems, then, if that is the case; that, in general language, (for it is impossible to be particular in the case,) we should indicate the general purpose and object for which that police is to be afforded. As for instance: we do not wish to furnish, by the Federal Government, men to go to the city markets to enforce the necessary details of its arrangements, to prescribe the position of the wagon of B, or the wagon of C, to interfere in the petty quarrels and difficulties between the occupant of one stall and that of another; to see that A's butter stall does not encroach upon B's cabbage department—indeed that they shall be engaged in any of the local or merely municipal matters of the District. Neither do we, at least on this side of the House, want to pay, out of the Federal Treasury, for a police that shall be engaged in hunting fugitive slaves in the District of Columbia. I am desirous that we shall agree in relation to this matter; I am desirous that we shall furnish all proper and reasonable aid that we can be called upon to furnish to keep the peace of the city, to protect the property of the city, and to protect the lives of those who come here to do business; but I am not willing that we shall be involved in all their local regulations, or in those dishonorable and disgraceful regulations to which I have alluded; and I never will vote for any police bill that is not guarded on this point. This use of the police was objected to the other day by my colleague on the right, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] and allusion was made on the other side to that objection. It was justly said that a portion of the opposition to this bill arises from that cause. Some do oppose it mainly from the fact that the police heretofore have shown more zeal in protecting the slave property of the District—if property it can be called, than they did—

The question was taken, and Mr. Bliss's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to add the following proviso to the bill:

"Provided, That said auxiliary guard shall not be employed in the arrest of any person except those charged with crime or other offenses against the law."

Mr. Chairman, I do this merely for the purpose of stating a fact. I have this morning received the report of an attorney employed by myself to investigate a case where a freeman is now in prison, and sentenced to be sold unless his friends come forward and pay the expenses of his imprisonment. My attorney, employed for that purpose, has found witnesses who will testify under oath that the man who is imprisoned has been a freeman from his childhood up. I state this fact that northern men may know that in this bill we are paying northern money to involve northern honor, and to imprison and sell freemen into slavery.

Mr. MILLSON. I can only express my regret that the gentleman from Ohio should take the opportunity, in the consideration of a bill deemed necessary for the protection of public property and of the persons of citizens residing in the city of Washington, to introduce topics involving those peculiar matters which seem to be his delight to dwell upon. Does the gentleman desire to defeat the passage of the amendment altogether? He must be aware that he could not adopt a more successful mode of assailing the amendment I have submitted than that?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will you, my dear friend, imprison and sell men into slavery?

Mr. MILLSON. The question has no application to anything in this discussion before the House; but the gentleman ought not to put such a question; for he ought to have known that there is no gentleman here who could be induced to consent to sell a free person into slavery.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then why not accept the amendment?

Mr. MILLSON. The object of the amendment seems to be to prevent the police force from being engaged in the arrest of fugitive slaves. What have we to do with that? Is it the duty of Congress to undertake to prescribe in advance the occasion upon which these men will be called upon to act? We provide for a police force. It is the duty of the magistrates and the judges to control the manner in which that force is to be employed. I trust the committee will reject the amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. GIDDINGS,

Mr. LOVEJOY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JEWETT and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 89.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. MILLSON's amendment.

Mr. MILLSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MILLSON and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I desire to offer an amendment in line eleven.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in in the second line, after the word "Washington," so as to extend the operations of the bill to the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I perceive that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, as proposed by him, would come in before my amendment in the order of the text, and if I do not lose the advantage of the proposition already made by me in the shape of an amendment, I will yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman withdraws his amendment, he can offer it subsequently.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment last adopted, by inserting after the word "Washington," in the second line, the words, "and any law for the preservation of the peace and good order of the said city, and in the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is hardly in order now to amend that amendment, as it has been adopted, and is now part of the text of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I propose to amend the text as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. It would have been in order before the vote was taken on the adoption of the amendment; but now that it has been adopted, it is not in order to insert anything more.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I was told otherwise a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that he told the gentleman otherwise. The section is open to amendment; but no part of it is which the committee have incorporated into the section.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, do I understand that I cannot get a proposition in to extend this auxiliary guard to the District of Columbia?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the gentleman could get it in in another part of the bill, but he could not get it in in this amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I now move to strike out in the eleventh line, after the word "time," the words "when specially ordered to do so," so that the text will read, "to serve during the night and in the day-time."

The reason of this, Mr. Chairman, is obvious. If we are to institute a police, their obligation should be as broad as their duty, and the obligation should not be limited, by the act which appoints them, to serve during the night, and in the day-time when specially ordered to do so. I would provide that they should do their duty at all times, night and day, whether specially ordered to do so or not.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to strike from the first section the words, "and the captains, lieutenants, and men, shall be appointed by the chief, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary," and in lieu thereof to insert as follows:

And the captains, lieutenants, and men, shall be appointed by a board of commissioners, hereby created and established, for the purposes herein named, to consist of the Mayor of Washington, the district attorney of the District of Columbia, and the marshal of the said District, and may be dismissed by said commissioners, but only for cause shown on due notice to the delinquent, and after trial before them; such proceedings and dismissal to be subject, nevertheless, to the review and approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes a radical change in the features and the principle of the bill. As it stands, the appointment of the chief is vested in the hands of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the appointment of the captain, lieutenants, and men, is remotely vested in the same authority, although specifically confided to the chief—the chief, in fact, owing his appointment to the President of the United States. In my judgment, the men who are to be appointed by the chief, and dismissed by him at his pleasure, will become the subservient tools of that chief; and the chief himself must necessarily become an arbitrary autocrat; and in such case the conservation of the lives and property of the citizens of Washington, and of ourselves, must necessarily be made dependent upon the will and pleasure, the neglect or care, of the chief, who has his appointment at the hands of the President. I deem this a radical defect, and I have endeavored to cure that defect by the amendment, which provides that, the chief being appointed by the President, the captains, lieutenants, and men shall be appointed by a board of commissioners, and that that board of commissioners shall be constituted of officers in the District of Columbia, who most probably would be most familiar with the wants of the District, and the proper character of the men to be selected to supply those wants; and, in another respect, it would be exceedingly unjust and improper that these men should be dismissed at the pleasure and arbitrary will of the chief, who might be a political partisan. It is too dangerous and too extensive a power to vest in the hands of any man. These men thus selected should hold their places for life, or during good behavior, and should be displaced only after trial had, upon notice given, and judgment pronounced, and that judgment of the board of commissioners should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I think, sir, in all earnestness and sincerity, that if this feature is given to this bill it will be relieved, in a great measure, of the objections urged to it.

Mr. BURNETT. I am in favor of the passage of a police bill, but I desire that it shall first be perfected. It strikes me, however, that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York be adopted, it will render the provisions of the bill totally inefficient. He proposes to allow the President to appoint the chief, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He is willing to lodge that power in the Executive, and he then proposes that the men shall be appointed by a board of commissioners to be composed of the Mayor, the district attorney, and the marshal of this District. What is the object of a chief? That there shall be a head to direct and control this police force and their operation in securing peace and good order to this city. By this amendment that power is taken from him, and the one hundred men are appointed by an independent and distinct board of commissioners. What will be the result? You place this chief at the head of this police force; you compel him to see that they enforce the laws and preserve good order; and yet you deprive him of the only guarantee he has for the execution of his wishes in that respect—you lodge the power of appointment, not in him, but in another, a separate and distinct board of commissioners, and thus, in my judgment, destroy the efficiency of the guard altogether. We had better, a great deal, adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER.] I would prefer that, for the reason that that proposes to confer upon these commissioners the entire power of appointing, not only the men, but the chief and the other officers. Where the board appointed the chief and the men too, the force would be more efficient than if the chief were appointed by one, and the men by another.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] says that it is too much power to place in the hands of one man. Why, sir, there is not a head of Department under this Government that does not exercise more power than would this chief of police; yet in those cases it is not regarded as dangerous, nor was it so regarded by the founders of the Government. I hold that, when you confer upon the President of the United States the power to appoint a chief, he would appoint a man of integrity and character, and who had a fitness for the place; and I will say for myself that I have confidence enough in the President of any party to believe that, were this power conferred, he would select a man who would not exhibit the qualities which the gentleman from New York fears so much.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he is not aware that the police of New York have been appointed in a similar method, by a board of commissioners, composed of the Mayor, the recorder, and the city judge?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know how the matter works in New York; but I know this, that the city of New York has been in a state of war about its police for the last three years.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. But not upon that question.

Mr. BURNETT. But it is charged that the police of New York is inefficient, and does not execute the laws; and it will be an additional objection with me if the police of New York is appointed in that manner. I appeal to gentlemen upon all sides. We cannot each one of us get this bill in a shape to meet all our particular views. It is impossible. I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON.] But every man of the committee, or at least a majority of the committee, admit the necessity of a police here. The obligations upon Congress to establish an efficient police are, in my judgment, of the very highest character. We ought to pass some law, and I appeal to gentlemen here not to put into the bill amendments which will render the police totally inefficient. The amendment of the gentleman from New York proposes to leave the appointment of the chief in the hands of the President, and then proposes to constitute a board of commissioners to appoint the men under him, thus leaving the chief entirely without control over his men. It at once destroys the unity of a police force, and, in my judgment, its efficiency.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out the words "Mayor of Washington." The committee has just determined that we ought to establish an auxiliary guard only to aid in the enforcement of the regulations of Washington for the protection of life and property. What have we to do with the Mayor of Washington? What right have we to call upon the Mayor of Washington to aid in the execution of any of our laws? We are now proceeding independently of the corporation of Washington. We are establishing a guard for Federal purposes, and the city of Washington is left to establish a police for their own government. Sir, I am surprised at the sensitiveness manifested by gentlemen in reference to what they suppose to be the enormous powers to be granted to the President of the United States. It may be that I see very incorrectly the dignity of the occasion; but I confess I see nothing in this bill but a simple proposition to organize a body of watchmen. My friend from New York, who proposes this amendment, is doubtless not actuated by those fears and apprehensions which seem to animate some gentlemen upon the other side of the House. Some of them objected to the power being given to the President of the United States, because it was too vast a power to be intrusted to the Executive of the United States. Other gentlemen objected because it was too small a power to trouble the Executive with. They do not want to degrade the President to the level of a police officer. I see no such enormous power given to this superintendent of police; and yet gentlemen seem to apprehend that the existence at Washington of this central luminary will lead to the most fearful consequences; that this huge central mass will attract to it the lesser orbs, the States which are to revolve about it, and lead to a general consolidation of our Union. Why, sir, it may be that the liberties of the people of the United States may be trampled under foot by the investment in the President of such a tremendous power. It may be that our Union will be broken into fragments, or, what perhaps is still worse, converted into a consolidated Government. It may be that it may be far preferable that the superintendent of police should be elected as the President is, by electors chosen by the people of the United States once in four years. But as that would involve an inconvenient change of the Constitution of the United States, we cannot adopt that mode at the present time.

I am, therefore, content that the appointment of the superintendent of police shall remain where it is proposed to be vested—in the President; and that the superintendent shall have the selection of his captains and watchmen.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The reason for including the Mayor of Washington in this board of police commissioners was simply in respect to the peculiar character of the police to be created. We have already an existing police. This force, if created, will be claimed to be an auxiliary body to that police. The police already existing is somewhat under the control, questionless, of the Mayor and authorities of the city of Washington; and if you create an auxiliary body without referring that body at all to the control or to the judgment of the head of the present existing police, you will compose a body outside of their authority, and, in some degree, perhaps, in conflict with them. It is in order to compose a homogeneous body that it is proposed that one of the officers who has control of the present body of police shall have something to say in the control of the auxiliary guard proposed to be created. And, for another reason, it was proposed that the Mayor of Washington should be one of those commissioners; and that is, that he is the one among them who is more immediately responsible to the popular vote. The President of the United States unquestionably is answerable to those who exercise the elective franchise in the Union; the marshal is answerable to the President; and the Mayor is answerable for the method in which he shall discharge his duties to his constituents about him. Thus are there three elements selected for this board of commissioners.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is competent for Congress to impose upon municipal officers the duty of performing municipal duties not connected with charter duties in conjunction with Federal officers?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think so clearly. I think that it is perfectly competent, and within the power of Congress, to impose any duty upon citizens, whether officers or not, for the conservation of the property and peace of this District. These are the reasons why I propose to include the Mayor of the city of Washington on this board; and I think that if the Mayor should be stricken from the board, it will remain incongruous and inefficient.

The previous question being on Mr. MILLSON's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. GREENWOOD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and TRIPPE were appointed.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. JOHN COCHRANE's amendment.

Mr. MILLSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MILLSON and ADRAIN were appointed.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 63.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILES. I offer the following amendment, to be added to the first section of the bill:

And the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to purchase twenty-five horses for the use of the chief, captain, lieutenants, and such of the privates as the chief may detail for mounted service.

Mr. STANTON. I want to move to amend by adding "ten mules." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. MILES. Gentlemen may treat the amendment with ridicule; but I speak from experience, and I offer the amendment in perfect good faith. I have seen something of the working of police systems, and have studied them with some care. It was my duty so to do, for I had the honor to be Mayor of the city of Charleston for the last two years. I introduced a system of police there, the result of much study and reflection, and of the comparison of various police systems, both in this country and Europe. I found that in the best organized systems, a mounted force was an essential constituent of it. My own experience in Charleston, where we have fifty mounted men, convinced me that a mounted force is almost indispensable. It is utterly impossible, in a city covering the extent of ground of this city, for one hundred men to guard it effectually. It is impossible for the officers—the chief, captain, and lieutenants—to go the rounds in such a manner as to be satisfied that the patrolmen are doing their duty, unless they be mounted. The best authorities on this subject in Europe, where the police system has been reduced to a more thorough and scientific form than elsewhere, show that one mounted man can patrol as much space as five footmen can. On the question of economy, on which so much has been said, I think that the having twenty-five mounted policemen will be an actual saving of money. With these remarks, I submit my amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I was originally in favor of a bill establishing an efficient police in this city; but I am rather of opinion now, that after all the doctoring it has been and is being subjected to, it cannot receive my support. I have no doubt that the gentleman from South Carolina is correct when he states that a mounted police is more efficient and can do more service than a foot police. His amendment, if adopted, would have another advantage; and that is, it would have the effect of keeping the policemen out of the corner groceries. But, if we can pass a bill of this kind at all—of which I have much doubt—we can only pass a bill to increase the number of police on foot. I am satisfied that if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, however deficient a foot-police system may be, the bill cannot possibly be passed. In addition to the expenses incurred by the creation of the police itself, this amendment would entail the necessity of erecting public stables for the horses, procuring grooms, procuring forage, and incurring other expenses in addition to the purchase of the horses. I had hoped, when the proposition was made to create this additional police force, that it would have met no serious opposition. The proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] just adopted, is certainly very objectionable to me. It was my impression that the Mayor should have nothing to do with this police; that it should be independent of the Mayor in every sense of the word.

If the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina should be adopted, the expense, as provided for by the bill, and which is so much complained of, will be greatly increased. I very much regret, if it is the intention of the House to adopt a police system at all, to see so much disposition manifested to propose amendments to the bill. There are various modes of killing off a bill, but there is no mode more effectual than by proposing and adopting amendments which must make it odious to members. I freely confess that I am in favor of the adoption of some system by which the peace of the city will be more efficiently preserved; but if we adopt the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, I am satisfied that it will defeat the bill; and I hope, therefore, that it will be voted down.

Mr. MILES. Is it now in order for me to move to amend my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can modify his amendment.

Mr. MILES. I propose to offer an amendment to my amendment by way of modification.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would not be entitled to make a speech upon it.

Mr. MILES. Should I not have a right to explain it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has had five minutes to explain his amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] what has been the experience in the city of New York in reference to this question of a mounted police?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am not aware that we have yet resorted to a mounted police there, although it is generally understood to be greatly needed.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, by striking out "five," so as to make the number of mounted men twenty, instead of twenty-five.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is the honest intention of every member upon this floor to try and get up an efficient police, if one is to be established at all. I am glad that the gentleman from South Carolina has brought forward his proposition. It is a common-sense proposition. No gentleman can deny that it is utterly impossible for a man upon foot to travel over Washington city, and see that the subordinates are discharging their duties properly. If you can get a mounted force of honest, active, and energetic men, my word for it, from the experience of the city of Savannah, in my own State, you will have an efficient police, and be able to restore order in the city of Washington. Gentlemen may attempt to ridicule the proposition; but the city of Washington covers a large area of territory. We all know the labor we have to undergo in going from one office to another to attend to our ordinary business. Now, I submit that no force on foot can keep this city in a proper state of order and subordination, especially with the amount of vicious population turned in here from all parts of the United States every time Congress meets. [Laughter.] Of course I do not allude to the members of Congress. I allude to gentlemen—some very clever, and some very vicious—who come here to get office; and then I have no doubt that a great number of men congregate here to steal while we are in session. It is that class of men that we have to hunt up; it is the crimes committed by that class of men that have got to be suppressed. I think the resident population here is as good as that of any other city of the same size. It is the floating population that you have to deal with; and you cannot suppress crime, in my opinion, unless you get up an efficient mounted police. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will be adopted.

Mr. MILES. I desire to defend my amendment. I have already stated to the committee the views which influenced me in offering it. In my personal experience as Mayor of a city with a population about the same as that of Washington, (the population of Charleston is now about sixty thousand,) I discovered that the use of these mounted men was most important; and notwithstanding the great opposition to it at first, I believe that now the citizens of Charleston would abolish any feature of their police system sooner than they would this mounted force. It has been tested thoroughly; it has been tried and not found wanting.

Gentlemen here lay great stress, as I said before, upon the question of dollars and cents as connected with the police. Sir, I confess that does not weigh with me at all. What! Shall we, the Representatives of a great country, in the capital of a great nation, where we are building sumptuous palaces, and expending millions upon millions in costly edifices and public works, hesitate to spend a few dollars in maintaining peace, order, and security, for life and property? I am amazed at this class of objections. I, for one—I say it unhesitatingly, and I would put it on the yeas and nays, if you, sir, demanded them—I would spread it on the wings of the wind all over the country, that I, for one, am willing to vote half a million of dollars per annum, if necessary, to make Washington a decorous, respectable, safe, and secure city.

But, sir, with reference to this special point, I have alluded to some of the advantages of mounted men. The officers must be mounted in order to patrol the whole city and see that the men are doing their duty; and some of the men must use horses in order to cover the extensive territory on the outskirts of the city, where very often fugitives from justice are lurking. But let me impress upon the committee the importance of mounted police where the force is small. The committee have already, by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] cut down the force to one altogether inadequate. In Charleston, with a population the same as that of Washington, and infinitely more quiet and orderly, I am proud and happy to say, where murders and assassinations are utterly unknown, and where no man in the dead of night has been struck down by the ruffian arm of violence—with our quiet and orderly population, we have one hundred footmen and fifty mounted men, in addition to eighteen sergeants, six lieutenants, two captains, and a chief. I think it absolutely important that with this diminished force we should mount the men to make them effective. Suppose disorder occurs at any single point: your mounted man can spread the alarm at once, in five minutes, collect together the foot men stationed at different points, and hurry them to the scene of action. Suppose a fire breaks out: how can the alarm be spread by any means so rapidly as by a mounted horseman, dashing off at once and communicating it? I believe that if the committee adopt the amendment, in a few months' time this mounted force will be regarded as the most valuable portion of the whole system.

Mr. SEWARD, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MILES, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BISHOP. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BISHOP. Well, I make that motion.

Mr. GROW. That motion is not in order, for there is a rule which provides that no bill shall be reported to the House while an amendment is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The present incumbent of the Chair is of the opinion, that under that rule, and the resolution closing debate on this bill, the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order at this time. The 119th rule is as follows:

"A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection."

The 136th rule is as follows:

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present. The House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered."

In the opinion of the Chair the motion to strike out the enacting clause may be made; or rather, it may be recommended to the House that the enacting clause be stricken out; but that question does not come up in committee until the pending amendments, and those which may be offered, are disposed of.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Do not the words of the rule imply that this motion may be entertained at any time when a motion to amend would be entertained?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, under the 136th rule, and the resolution closing debate.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Then I would ask whether, when an order was made in the House to close debate, it was not a mere majority order, which did not suspend any other rule of the House than those described in the rule just read?

The CHAIRMAN. It was an order passed by a majority; but the 136th rule provides that the committee, when debate is closed, shall vote on such amendments as may be pending, or may be offered. Then, the motion to strike out the enacting clause not being an amendment, the amendments must first be disposed of. The Chair is aware that the committee, on former occasions, have determined otherwise, but he never did think that those decisions were right. If the committee are dissatisfied with his present ruling they can take an appeal, and he will cheerfully submit the question for the decision of the committee itself.

Mr. BISHOP. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. I ask that the 127th rule be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"127. Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered; the body of the bill shall not be debated, or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken."

Mr. BOCK. Would not the Chair feel itself at liberty to conform to the established usage?

The CHAIRMAN. While here, the Chair will only conform to what he thinks is right.

Mr. BOCK. The Treasury note bill was got out of committee by a motion to strike out the enacting clause, and there the decision was in favor of the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moved to strike out the enacting clause. The Chair decided that that motion was not in order while an amendment was pending or proposed to be offered. From that decision the gentleman takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BISHOP. I withdraw my appeal.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to strike out the first section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall be the duty of the marshal of the District of Columbia to see to the preservation of the peace and the execution of the criminal laws thereof; and to enable him to perform said duty, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint three captains at $1,200 each, and sixty men at $500 each, payable monthly out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, who shall obey all the lawful commands and regulations of said marshal: Provided, That the laws now in force authorizing the appointment of a police force who are appointed by the Mayor of the city of Washington, and are paid by the United States, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. Chairman, the committee will remember that there is a police force now employed by the Government here of some thirty men. These men are appointed by the Mayor of this city, and paid for out of the Federal Treasury, which is an anomaly. Now, as we have a marshal for this District, who in the system here is the peace officer, and universally recognized as such, I propose that the appointment of these men shall be conferred upon him; and that there shall be a force of sixty men appointed by the marshal of the District, who shall be paid the sum specified, and who shall obey the orders of the marshal—it being his duty to enforce the criminal laws, and preserve the peace of this District. I think if gentlemen will give their attention to this substitute, they will find that it covers the whole matter; that it will answer every purpose contemplated by this legislation, at any rate as an experiment, and that it will fully secure the peace and good order of this city. So believing, I have presented it. It is simple in its form, distinct in its features. It places the force under an officer known to the law, whose special duty it is to preserve the peace and execute the criminal laws of the city. The committee also will see that it is free from many of the objections taken to the schemes heretofore presented; and therefore it ought, in my judgment, to prevail.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. It is, that the amendment, as I understand it, proposes to strike out what has already been adopted by the committee in the first section of the bill, and for that reason it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order to strike out any one of these amendments, as a separate proposition; but it certainly is in order to move to strike out any one of them including some other part of the section, or to move to strike out the whole of the first section, and to insert an entire new section.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia by striking out "five," and inserting "eight," so that the annual compensation paid to the sixty men provided for by this amendment shall be $800 instead of $500.

The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia is certainly designed to have the effect, if adopted, of defeating the pending proposition of his colleague. I regret, as I before remarked, that there is a disposition manifested by the committee to propose amendments which would not, if adopted, increase the number of the friends of the bill. If, however, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is to be adopted, the object of my amendment is to give something like an adequate salary for the discharge of the duties imposed upon these men. You cannot possibly get a dozen men to accept of the position at a salary of $500. You could hardly find a respectable loafer in the city of Washington—and I regret to say there are many of them—who would be willing to accept a position under the marshal at that salary. If we want an efficient police, the salary should be sufficient to induce respectable men to accept the position as a member of that police. I am sure the gentleman from Virginia, upon reflection, will not hesitate to agree with me that $500 will not be a compensation sufficient to induce any respectable man to accept of the position. It may be true that there are a large number of persons here who are unemployed. They are transient persons; and I am sure if they are persons of family, and intend to reside in the city, they cannot do so and live upon $500 a year. A large part of the laboring population of the city, I understand, are tenants; and that sum would scarcely pay their house rent.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is to be adopted, I want it amended. I confess I am opposed to my own amendment, as well as to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia; and I hope they will both be rejected by the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not understand the force of the closing remark of the gentleman, for it indicates his hostility to any bill on the subject.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am in favor of the bill reported by the gentleman's colleague originally, with an amendment which I designed to offer.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. One word as to our ability to procure competent men. The gentleman says there are idle men here. Now, there are plenty of them also in Arkansas, and perhaps mischievously employed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I will say that they are to be found occasionally everywhere. Some are to be found in my own State, but not so many in proportion to population as are to be found here.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There are a great many border jails, which indicate that there are many persons there who have nothing to do. But be that as it may, there are many men engaged as watchmen around our public buildings who get only $450 dollars a year, and there is no difficulty in the world in getting hale, hearty young men, who will be willing to perform this duty, and do it effectually, for $500 salary. I do not consider an increase of price as a guarantee of efficient service. The moment a man gets more money than is necessary, he is apt to get into mischief. I think, therefore, the gentleman's amendment ought not to be adopted, for it is one mode of breaking down this bill by making it too expensive.

Mr. GREENWOOD, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia by increasing the compensation to $600.

The gentleman says you employ young men in the city of Washington at a salary of $450 a year. Granted. But you cannot get any man who will discharge the duties of his position faithfully, and to the exclusion of everything else, for $450. Men who hold these positions at $450 do not discharge their duties. They combine that with other business, and receive $450 in addition to what they can make by devoting really their whole time to other business. The only mode in which you can get good men, who will discharge their duties, is by paying them a salary which will command a high grade of service. The Committee for the District of Columbia, when they accepted the Senate bill, and put the sum at $600, were satisfied that they could not get sober and discreet men who would give their attention to the duties of policemen at less pay than that. It must strike the mind of every gentleman of this committee that $600 is certainly the lowest price at which you can obtain the services of competent men, in a city like this, where the expense of living is so great. I doubt very much whether you will be able to get such men at $600. As was well said by the gentleman from Arkansas, if you reduce the pay, the character of the men employed will be such that they will not discharge the duties imposed upon them. You will find that your policemen will hang around the grog-shops of Washington; and that they will be taken from the purloins of society. The charge now made against the present police, that they are men who do not discharge their duties, will be made against your auxiliary guard under this bill, if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia be adopted.

I hope the committee will not reduce the amount below $600. Let it stand at that; for I am satisfied that the services of competent men cannot be obtained at a less sum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] and I hope the committee will proceed to vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.]

The question was taken on Mr. BURNETT's amendment to the amendment; and it was adopted.

The question recurred on Mr. SMITH's amendment as amended.

Mr. STANTON. Does not that strike out what was inserted on motion of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. MILLSON?]

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANTON. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so. It would not be in order to strike out what has been inserted, taken separately and by itself; but, when the motion includes other portions of the section, the Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I would inquire whether the amendment, if adopted, will have the effect of striking out the whole section as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

The question was taken; and the amendment as amended was not agreed to.

Mr. REILLY. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section:

Provided, however, That at least the one half of the whole number of the men to be employed under the provisions of this act shall be taken from the States and Territories of the United States.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment for two reasons. In the first place, I believe that the people of Washington ought to be left perfectly free to regulate their municipal affairs in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. In the next place, I have found by experience that whenever a man is brought here from the States, and placed in a subordinate position, he deteriorates. I do not know why it is; whether by force of your political system, or by virtue of any law of nature, but I know that such is the fact. When I first came here as a member of the universal Democratic party, a young gentleman came to Washington from my district, and I got him a clerkship. In a little while I found that, although he had been respectable at home, he became lazy and improvident; and, as the crowning climax to the whole thing, he began, in a short time, to find fault with me, because I did not dress well enough for his ideas.

I do not want any men to come here from the States to get these subordinate positions. If any young man in the States can earn $1 50 a day, he had better stay at home and take chance of political elevation there. If you bring him here, you demoralize him; you take away his rights as a citizen, and subject him to that vicious, lazy, idle, improvident political system, which is the disgrace of the age we live in. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the first section, and insert in its stead the following:

That the sum of ——— dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, according to the provisions of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid in sustaining an efficient police for maintaining order in the city of Washington, to be paid to the municipal authority of said city, as the same may be required for said purpose, and to be expended by said authority in preserving good order in said city: Provided, That said city shall contribute to the expense of said police ——— per cent. of the expense thereof, to be advanced and paid by said city, at the same time with the money hereby appropriated.

My amendment, Mr. Chairman, is based upon the supposition that the city of Washington is capable of self-government, and that we may properly leave the government in the hands of the people, and on the further idea that the national Government should contribute its proportion to the police force, because, as I understand, the public buildings located in this city are not subject to taxation by the city. I have left blank the proportion which the United States should pay; the blank to be filled up by such sum as shall be determined upon. I am utterly opposed to a divided government of any description for any purpose. I think that the municipal government of the city of Washington is perfectly competent to prescribe rules and regulations for the government and maintenance of order of the city. If there be a defect in the power of the municipal authorities, the proper mode of remedying it would be by amending the charter of the city and giving them the necessary power. If they already possess the power, it is proper that they should exercise it and have the government of the city. I will not longer detain the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, but I will not detain the committee by giving the reasons. I think if we intend to dispose of this bill, we ought to come to a vote. I hope, therefore, that the original bill will be read through, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEITER] will be allowed to offer their substitutes. It is manifest that if we read each bill by sections, we shall not reach a vote to-day, nor for a week to come.

The amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, was rejected.

The Clerk then read the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size, and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. We have provided for a cavalry force, and must have stables for the horses. I move to insert after "guard-houses," the words "and stables." [Laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The fourth section was read, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I move to strike out the section appropriating $10,000. I do not believe in appropriating "secret service money;" there can be no necessity for its use, and I am apt to believe that it is often misapplied. A distinct appropriation, item by item, for every service of this description, should be made. There can be no occasion for appropriating money without specifying the objects to which it is to be applied.

But I have submitted this motion more for the purpose of suggestions upon other points, and hope I shall be indulged in making a few remarks in relation to the main question. If it is the design of the House to establish a police force here, independent, in some degree, of the Mayor and corporation, I hope we shall adopt means to give character and stability to that force. If we are to have a national guard, I would be in favor of bringing to this city a number of men from the different States of this Union, equal to half the number of Representatives in Congress. In this way only can an efficient police be obtained. Let those men be selected by the Representatives of the several districts, elect their own officers, and be subject, to such extent as Congress should provide, to the city authorities. You would thus get a class of men very different from those you now have in the police, who, it is said, are to be seen lying about in the gutters day and night, the constant inmates of rum-holes. Select them as your cadets are nominated, and you will obtain men of character, have the best police force ever organized, and give to it professional character and prominence. This notion may, at first, strike gentlemen as novel and perhaps impracticable; but I believe that gentlemen would select from their districts responsible, respectable, sober, honest, and competent men, whose choice of this as a profession would secure elevated characters.

One remark further. Gentlemen say that they want a police force because it is unsafe to go into the streets in the night time. I confess I have no such apprehension. I have been out often at night; have seen no violence; have felt no fears; not even in those streets not lighted. I shall vote against the Senate bill, not because I am not in favor of providing a sufficient police for the city, but because it is to organize a party police. I understood the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] who reported the bill, to say that, unless this police force could be appointed in the way he desired, he would see the whole bill defeated. He tells us that the city is threatened with robbers and murderers and cut-throats, but, unless we will allow the President to have the control of the appointment of the police, he will let these men go on, and rob and murder with impunity! Now, my notions of propriety lead me to believe that, if we are to have a police in this city, they ought to be appointed without reference to partisan feeling or character.

Mr. GOODE. The position I took, Mr. Chairman, was, that the Constitution required the appointment of chief of police to be made by the President, because it is an executive office. I am not here as the advocate of James Buchanan, but as the advocate of the Constitution, and the constitutional mode of appointment; and, sooner than violate the Constitution, I will lose the bill.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I understand the gentleman, then, to take the ground that the appointment cannot be constitutionally made in any other way. I do not so regard it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARREN. I do not see the remotest probability of getting through this bill, and I therefore renew the motion to strike out the enacting clause; and if the Chair decide the motion to be out of order, I shall respectfully appeal from his decision.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I will withdraw my amendment, if I have the floor to submit another motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot withdraw it without the unanimous consent of the committee.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. GROW. I make the same point of order on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas that I made on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP,] that it is not in order to move to strike out the enacting clause until the bill has been read through for amendment.

Mr. GOODE. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw his motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. WARREN. If I saw any hope to get through with this bill in any other way I would not have made the motion; and now, to see what the gentleman has to propose, I will withdraw it.

Mr. GOODE. I know the difficulties surrounding this measure as it now stands; but I feel impelled to make another effort to accomplish the object the Committee for the District of Columbia had in view in reporting on the question. The bill as it is now, will, in my humble judgment, be entirely inefficient for the purpose designed.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question pending, and debate is not in order.

Mr. GOODE. I propose to submit a proposition which I have deliberately matured, and which, I think, will be satisfactory to the committee. If we allow the bill to remain as it is now, I think we had as well leave this and go to other business. I ask the consent of the gentleman that my amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODD] be withdrawn.

Mr. DODD. I would like to have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. A motion is pending, and I insist that it be put.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion was made to strike out the fourth section, but was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. BURNETT. We have already consumed more time about this bill than we ought to; and, as we have fixed an early day for the adjournment, I hope that we will have a test question at once. I therefore move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GROW. I raise a point of order on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is not in order, and that the point is well taken. If debate had not been closed by the House, and the bill brought here under the operation of the 135th rule which requires amendments to be voted on, then the motion would take precedence of a motion to amend; but the bill being now under the operation of that rule, which requires that when debate is closed, the amendments pending, and offered, shall be first voted on before the bill is reported to the House, the Chair thinks the motion is not now in order.

Mr. BURNETT. I take an appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to know whether the doctrine has not been settled in cases precisely analogous to this; whether this motion to strike out the enacting clause has not been made and sustained by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state, that the House has heretofore sustained the decision that the motion was in order, even when a bill was under the operation of the 136th rule; but unfortunately, perhaps, for the gentleman who is now in the chair, he is not a lawyer, and does not consider himself bound by precedents which do not stand upon a right basis. [Laughter.] If the committee thinks that the Chair is wrong, it is for the committee to decide, and in that decision he will acquiesce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Mr. BLISS. What will be the effect of the pending motion?

The CHAIRMAN. It will cut off all the amendments, and send the bill to the House as clean as it came.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and ADRAIN were appointed.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 58.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DODD. I now offer my substitute, if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman has offered it before, and that it is now pending. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] proposed an amendment in lieu of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I propose to offer the following as an additional section to the original bill, before we proceed to the consideration of the substitutes:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

My object is to limit the existence of this guard, unless the necessities of the case should require it to be continued. My experience is that it will be much easier to prolong its existence by renewed legislation, than to abridge its existence when it is made permanent in its character. With that view I offer the amendment. It will enable another Congress to act upon the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. The only opposition I have to this amendment is this: I suppose if there is any one fact fixed and settled in the future beyond all possible controversy, it is that the grand Republican army will control this country in 1860. [Laughter.] Whether the gentleman intends to deprive us of officers, I do not know.

The amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following additional section:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the corporation of the city of Washington be authorized to pass laws for the exclusive regulation of the fire department, and that all acts passed heretofore inconsistent with the same, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That the corporation shall take immediate measures for the abolishment of the volunteer fire department, and the creation of a paid fire department in lieu of the same, and for the establishment of a fire alarm and police telegraph.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. The amendment is not germane to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds the point of order well taken, and rules out the amendment. No further amendment being offered to the bill, the question recurred on the amendment by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE], to the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD] for the bill.

Mr. GOODE. I would inquire whether it is competent for me to modify my amendment before the question is taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to withdraw or modify it in any form he thinks proper.

Mr. GOODE. I propose to withdraw it, and offer as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from New York, what I send to the Clerk's desk. It is nearly identical with the proposition I originally offered. It differs from it in dimi-ishing the force twenty-five men and one lieutenant, so as to reduce the number of men to seventy-five, and the lieutenants to three. It moreover provides for the establishment of one guard-house only.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the entire withdrawal of an amendment, and the substitution of another, is a modification of the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that it is, as it is different. But if it be not, the first being withdrawn, the gentleman has a right to offer another.

The amendment, by way of substitute, was as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be established an auxiliary guard, or watch, for the protection of persons and property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,500, one captain at an annual salary of $1,400, three lieutenants at an annual salary of $1,000 each, and seventy-five men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly; to serve during the night, and in the day time. The chief of the auxiliary guard shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; the captain and lieutenants shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and may be dismissed by the chief at his pleasure, or upon the order of the said Secretary. The men shall be appointed by the chief of the guard, and dismissed at his will and pleasure.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the said chief is also authorized and empowered to establish a guard-house at such point in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the district attorney for the District of Columbia, the marshal of the said District, and the chief of the auxiliary guard, are hereby authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captain and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers of Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the chief of the guard shall be invested with the criminal jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and required to hold a court daily for the trial of misdemeanors and petty offenses, to be decided according to the laws of the District of Columbia, and summarily disposed of; but in no case shall he inflict punishment greater than a fine of twenty dollars or confinement in a jail, workhouse, or house of correction, for a term exceeding twenty days.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This section to take effect so soon as the chief shall report to the Secretary of the Interior that he has thirty men enrolled and ready for duty.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the sum of money necessary to carry this act into effect, not to exceed $70,000, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SEWARD. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as it would be an amendment in the third degree.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment of Mr. GOODE, by way of a substitute for the substitute of Mr. DODD,

Mr. BURNETT called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JEWETT and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 85.

So the substitute proposed by Mr. GOODE was rejected.

Mr. LEITER then offered the following as a substitute for Mr. DODD's substitute:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be established an auxiliary guard, or watch, for the protection of persons and property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That John C. Fitzpatrick, John A. Linton, and Richard Wallach, of said city, be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners of police for said city for the term of two years, at an annual salary of $2,000 each, whose duty it shall be to appoint the chief of police, captain, and lieutenants of the guard, who shall hold their offices, respectively, at the pleasure of the commissioners aforesaid; and that said commissioners shall have power to fill any vacancy that may occur in their body during the recess of Congress; that the chief of police shall appoint the men, with the approval of the commissioners of police, and they may be dismissed by him at his pleasure, or upon the order of said commissioners.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size, and the chief is authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the commissioners aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners of police be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to make and establish rules and regulations for the government of said guard.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of police, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That commissioners of police shall be appointed hereafter biennially by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, and all vacancies that shall occur during the sessions of Congress shall be filled in the same manner.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That each member of the auxiliary guard, before entering upon the discharge of his duty, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully and impartially discharge his duties as such guard.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act to take effect twenty days after the passage thereof.

Mr. TRIPPE. Is it in order to offer an additional section to the substitute of the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not at this time. There is an amendment pending which must first be disposed of.

Mr. LEITER. I wish to say that my substitute is exactly in the form in which it has been printed, except that I have substituted the name of John C. Fitzpatrick for that of Walter Lenox.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I think we have got this bill pretty much in the condition that the dog's leg was in, according to the old story, after the Devil had taken out the bone and put in a stick. [Laughter.] I think we had better leave it as it is, and vote down the amendment. Let us then vote on the substitute of the gentleman from New York, and report the bill to the House, where we can determine by yeas and nays what sort of bill we will have. It is getting late in the day, and I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee rise. It is not worth while to stay here any longer.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out the names of the commissioners?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. LEITER's substitute, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on the substitute proposed by Mr. DODD, which is as follows:

A bill to establish an efficient police for the city of Washington.

That the boards of the City Council of the city of Washington shall forthwith appoint commissioners of election, according to the charter of said city, who shall, on four days' notice after the passage of this act, hold an election for the choice of four commissioners of police, in manner following: At such election each voter of the city of Washington shall vote for two persons for commissioners of police, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than two names; and the four persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and two of them shall hold their offices for two years, and two of them for one year from the day of said election; and the person having the greatest and the person having the lowest number of votes shall be the two to go out of office at the end of one year; and if any two have the same and the highest or the lowest number of votes, such two shall draw lots between themselves to determine which shall go out of office; and there shall be an election on the same day every succeeding year, held as above directed, for two commissioners of police, at which each voter shall vote for one person only, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than one name; and the two persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and shall hold their office for two years from the day of their election; and the said four commissioners of police shall constitute a board, to any act or resolution whereof the assent of three of said board, entered on its minutes in writing, shall be necessary; and said board is hereby invested with power to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, the police force hereinafter provided for, and also to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, such police force as now exists under the authority of the boards of the City Council, or may be hereafter established; and the said board shall make rules and regulations for the government of all the said police authorized by this act or by the said boards of the said City Councils.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be established a police force for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain at an annual salary of $1,300, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the chiefs authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the commissioners aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to each commissioner chosen and serving under this act an annual salary of $1,000.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of police, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That each member of the police force, before entering upon the discharge of his duty, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully and impartially discharge his duties as such.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MILLSON. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York shall be voted down, will not the question then be before the House on the Senate bill, and cannot a separate vote be had upon all the amendments agreed to by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. If the proposition of the gentleman from New York shall be adopted in lieu of the bill, the effect will be to cut off all the amendments which the committee have adopted to the Senate bill, and the Senate bill will be reported to the House with but one amendment—the substitute of the gentleman from New York. If the substitute of the gentleman from New York shall be voted down, then the bill will be reported to the House with the amendments adopted by the committee, and in the House there can be a separate vote upon each of those amendments, as the Chair understands the rules and practice of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on Mr. DODD's proposition.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BARKSDALE and CHAFFEE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 59.

So the substitute was adopted.

Mr. GREENWOOD moved the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly an act (S. No. 232) to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject; and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEITT. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PEYTON and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 79.

Mr. BURNETT. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move that there be a call of the House; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Pending the previous question, the motion that there be a call of the House is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Curry, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, McClay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Milson, Montgomery, Morgan, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandage, Scales, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Zollieffer—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Howard, Kilgore, Knapp, Lovejoy, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Rieaud, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—76.

So the motion was agreed to Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. GOODE stated that Mr. EDIE had paired off with Mr. PHILLIPS.

Mr. CLAY stated that Mr. FAULKNER had paired off with Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. LETCHER stated that Mr. HOPKINS had been confined to his room for several days by sickness.

Mr. HARLAN stated that Mr. KELSEY was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that Mr. KUNKLE, of Maryland, had paired off with Mr. HORTON.

Mr. JACKSON stated that Mr. LAMAR was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. SHAW stated that Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, had paired off with Mr. POWELL; also, that Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, had paired off with Mr. LAMAR.

Mr. PALMER stated that Mr. MORSE, of New York, had paired off with Mr. WARD.

Mr. HOWARD stated that Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, had paired off with Mr. GILLIS.

The House accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 20, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. GEORGE D. CUMMINS, D. D. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSTITUTION OF DESERT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a letter of the Delegate of the Territory of Utah, in Congress, accompanied by a memorial of delegates to the convention which assembled at Great Salt Lake City, and adopted a constitution with a view to the admission of Utah into the Union as a State, together with a copy of that constitution.

Mr. JONES. I move to refer that communication to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SEWARD. Let us hear the paper read.

The Clerk read the following letter:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 19, 1858.

SIR: May I respectfully request you to present to the Senate the constitution and memorial herewith inclosed.

I am, with high respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. BERNHISEL,

Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the communication will be laid on the table, so that we may have an opportunity to see it, and that it will not be referred at the present moment.

Mr. HALE. Let it be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that it be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator include in his motion the printing of the constitution and memorial?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suppose the motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. Being a communication from a Territory, it stands on the same footing as a communication from the Legislature of a State, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the impression of the Chair. Any communication from a Territorial Legislature or State Legislature, the Senate can order to be printed at once.

The motion to print was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KING presented the petition of S. Gilbert and others, praying that a grant of land may be made to aid in the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hold in my hand a memorial from the grand jury for Washington county, in the District of Columbia, and another signed by numerous members of the bar of the District, stating that they had heard with surprise and deep regret that a petition was in circulation and being signed, asking of Congress such action as may lead to the removal of the present upright and able judge who presides in the criminal court of this District. I move that these memorials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for carrying the mails between Philadelphia and Southampton, in England, in the Collins line of steamers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES presented a number of petitions and papers in relation to the establishment of certain mail routes in the State of Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a paper in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Ontonagon to Copper Harbor, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 43) to settle doubts in relation to the title of certain common-field lots in the State of Missouri, heretofore granted to the inhabitants of the city of St. Louis, for the support of schools, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass. He also submitted an adverse report on the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTES IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post routes: From Ashton, Iowa, to Decatur, in Nebraska Territory; from Bellefontaine, via Attica and Gosport, to Chanton; from Bloomfield, Iowa, to Lancaster, Missouri; from Bradford to Rockford; from Cedar Falls, via Willoughby, Butler Center, Bear Grove, Mayville, Hampton, Saratoga, Belmont, and Irvington, to Algona; from Decorah, via Bluffton, Plymouth Rock, Twin Springs, Arnoldsville, Lime Springs, Forest City, and Le Roy, to Austin, in Minnesota Territory; from Dyersville, via Rockville and Hopkinton, to Anamosa; from Independence, via Chatham, Fairbank and Polk's Settlement, to Fredericksburg; from Johnsonport, via Rossville, Cleveland, Lybrand, Postville, Clearmont, to West Union; from Lansing to Twin Spring, (in Winneshiek county) to McGregory via Windsor, Elkader, Volga City, and Taylorsville, to Independence; from Magnolia, via Preparation, Boivdore, and Smithland, to Sioux City; from Monticello, via New Buffalo and McQueen's Mills, to Paris; from Mount Vernon, via New London and Paddington, to Clark's Ford; from Rockford to Rock Grove City, from Rockford, via west side of Shell Rock river, via Nora Springs, to Shell Rock Falls; from Webster, via Peck's, Cooper's, and Indianapolis, to Hopewell; from West Union, via Wapsi, Buck Run, and Martinsburg, to Waverly; from Belmont, via Liberty and Dacotah City, to Packard's Settlement, (on the Little Sioux); from Cascade, via Centre of Jones county, Isabel,

PAUPER AND CRIMINAL IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to regulate and restrain the immigration or importation into the United States of foreign paupers and criminals.

POST ROUTE IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Ontonagon to Copper Harbor in the State of Michigan.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on Saturday last I voted in the majority to postpone to the first Monday of December next, the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California. I desire to move a reconsideration of that vote, and as this is the last day on which the motion can be made, I present it now as a privileged question. I shall not ask for action upon it at this time. I only wish the motion to be recorded for future action.

The motion was recorded accordingly.

SAN FRANCISCO MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. GWIN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 2) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California. I hope there will be no objection to the motion. The resolution merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to take up and adjust these accounts. This contractor, on account of the embarrassments connected with this undertaking, and some others, has become insane, and is now in a lunatic asylum, and his family are in great distress. I hope the joint resolution will be acted on now. It has passed the Senate on one or two previous occasions, and it has been reported upon by the Committee on Claims favorably.

Mr. IVERSON. The wife of this contractor, Mr. Charles Homer, called on me this morning and presented an exceedingly affecting appeal. I understand from her that her husband, who was the contractor for the erection of this asylum, and to whom a considerable sum of money is undoubtedly due on account of it, was also the contractor with the Government for the erection of the custom-house at Richmond, Virginia. At the instance of Mr. Guthrie, under whom this contract was made, he agreed and undertook to furnish Virginia stone for the construction of the building, instead of importing stone from Maine, and other northeastern States. As a matter of pride to gratify the Virginia people, he undertook to furnish stone from the quarries of Virginia. Owing to the great difficulties he had to obtain it, he has been called upon to expend very much larger sums of money in the execution of the contract than otherwise would have been expended. About three or four weeks ago, he then laboring under great distress of mind, the Secretary of the Treasury insisted, as he could not go on, that the contract should be abrogated, and turned over to the Government for further execution. Under these circumstances, having paid out every cent he was able to rake or scrape to his employes, and they not being willing to go on with the work, it affected him so that he was attacked with a very severe brain fever, and in recovering from that he became deranged, and two weeks ago was carried to the lunatic asylum at Staunton, Virginia, and is now in that place. His physicians, as I understand from his wife, express the belief that if he were relieved from his pecuniary embarrassments (and the amount which this bill would bring to him might possibly enable him to go on with the work at Richmond, or satisfy the Secretary of the Treasury that he would be able to do so) it would cheer him in such a manner as perhaps to restore him to health. Under these circumstances I cannot but assist the motion made by the Senator from California, to take up this joint resolution, and pass it.

I may as well explain the facts of the case now, as afterwards, when the resolution shall be taken up. Mr. Homer made a contract with a former Secretary of the Treasury for the erection of a marine hospital at San Francisco, California. After the contract was entered into, a first, and then a second supplemental contract was entered into, by which the building was materially changed and enlarged. There was a certain amount of money appropriated by Congress for the construction of the building. By the alteration of the contracts, the enlargement of the building, and the increased expenditure consequent upon it, Mr. Homer had to advance large sums of money, not only in the purchase of materials, but in the employment of carpenters and other mechanics. The vouchers were presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, and they may be adjudicated and examined at any time; but the appropriation is exhausted. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot adjust the accounts of Mr. Homer under this contract, because the amount appropriated by Congress has been exhausted, and it requires an additional appropriation to enable him to pay the balance due to Mr. Homer.

At the last Congress a similar joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Claims, and reported by Mr. Brodhead precisely in the terms of this resolution. A report was made by Mr. Brodhead at that time, which the Committee on Claims, at the present session, have adopted, in these words:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of the contractor for erecting the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, report:

That they have examined the joint resolution and the following letter from the Department, giving the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in its favor.

The committee report the resolution without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Here follows a letter from Mr. Clark, chief clerk of the construction office, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 18, 1857.

SIR: I am requested by Major Bowman (who left hurriedly for Charleston this morning) to say to you that it would be almost, if not entirely, impossible for the committee to investigate fully during the remainder of the session of Congress, the voluminous details of the claim of C. Homer for extra work on the marine hospital at San Francisco; and that the Secretary approves of the resolution of the Senate, to refer the matter to him, to be finally settled on just and equitable principles.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. M. CLARK,

Chief Clerk of Construction.

Hon. R. BRODHEAD,
Chairman Committee on Claims, Senate Chamber.

At this session, this claim was presented to the committee. Understanding, from a reliable source, that the vouchers were of a very voluminous character, and the account rather intricate, we found it to be impracticable to go through them, and ascertain the amount justly due. Under the circumstances, we reported the joint resolution, which was passed at the last session, with an amendment. Instead of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay whatever may be found to be justly due under the contract, we say this:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, and to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount that may be found to be justly due to him under the contracts made between said contractor and the proper officers of the Government in reference to said building.

There is no difficulty about it. The contract controls the prices, controls the expenditures, and of course the contractor is entitled to everything due under the contract. All that is proposed by the resolution is, to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to take up his vouchers and pass upon them, and then the resolution appropriates a sufficient sum of money to pay whatever may be found due under the contract made between him and the proper officers of the Government in reference to the building, the contract being the governing law of the adjudication and settlement.

This resolution was called up last Friday, in the course of our progress with the Calendar, and was objected to by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] on the ground that it did not make an appropriation; but I think the Senator was mistaken; he could not have understood the resolution, because the resolution expressly provides for the payment, in these words:

"And to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount that may be found to be justly due to him under the contracts made between said contractor and the proper officers of the Government in reference to said building."

That appropriates whatever may be found to be due. The accounting officers take up the vouchers, examine them, pass upon them, and they ascertain the amount and pay it. I trust, sir, the resolution will, under the circumstances, be taken up by the Senate without any further delay.

The motion of Mr. Gwin was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to settle, upon principles of equity and justice, the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the marine hospital at San Francisco, and to pay to him whatever amount may be found to be justly due under his contract.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment to strike out of the original resolution the following words:

"Upon principles of equity and justice, the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, and to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, whatever amount may be found to be justly due to him under the said contract."

And to insert:

"And adjust the accounts of the contractors for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, and to pay to said contractor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount that may be found to be justly due to him under the contracts made between said contractor and the proper officers of the Government in reference to said building."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MEXICAN PROTECTORATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution I had the honor to submit some weeks since on the subject of a protectorate over Mexico and Central America; and I believe it is in order to offer some remarks on that motion.

Mr. HUNTER. I must say, in regard to that motion, that I shall have no objection to it, provided it will not supersede the consideration of the special order. When is the hour for its consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At one o'clock. Mr. HUNTER. Then I will say that of course I do not object to taking up the resolution, if at one o'clock we shall proceed with the special order.

Mr. GWIN. I thought the deficiency bill was the special order for twelve and a half o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order was fixed for half past twelve o'clock yesterday; but it is for one o'clock to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope I may be allowed to conclude my remarks; they are limited.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Texas tells me that he will not occupy more than an hour; and as I am anxious to go on with the deficiency bill, perhaps it would be better that he should commence now. It will only postpone the consideration of that bill for half an hour. I hope the Senate will consent to let him take up his resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution, for the purpose of offering a substitute, and proposing that it be referred to a special committee, to consist of seven. I do not suppose that will lead to any argument whatever. I wish to offer some views explanatory of the object of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. HOUSTON, in regard to establishing a protectorate over Mexico, and other Central American States.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, it will be recollected that a few weeks ago I offered a resolution to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into the expediency of establishing a protectorate over Mexico and the Central American States by this Government. That resolution, without being amply discussed, was laid upon the table. I have risen for the purpose of proposing a substitute for it, by which the inquiry shall be confined to Mexico, and submitted to a select committee.

It is, perhaps, nothing more than respectful to Great Britain, inasmuch as we have been negotiating with her for several years in relation to Honduras and the Mosquito shore, that the differences between the two countries should be amicably adjusted, if possible, before we proceed to intervene for the regulation of the affairs of the five puny States beyond Mexico. Moreover, the condition of most of those States, bad as it is, is incalculably better than that of our poor, distracted, adjoining neighbor. Their public demoralization, too, affects us less injuriously.

The State, sir, which I have enjoyed the honor of representing in this Chamber, in part, with my lost but unforgotten colleague, since the emblem of her national independence took its place among the galaxy of stars which is unfurled over our heads, has a paramount interest in the establishment of orderly government in Mexico. It is as essential to her public morality and general prosperity as is that of any one State in the Union to another. The line of partition between the United States and Mexico stretches nearly two thousand miles—one thousand of which is Texan. Along a considerable portion of that line, on our side, savages abound—over whose propensities for the commission of crime on the inhabitants on the other side, we can exercise, although obligated by solemn treaty stipulations to do so, no effectual restraint. On account of the depredations incessantly perpetrated by the Cananches and other tribes upon the Mexicans, the border population is steadily receding into the interior; and instead of progressive civilization, the chances multiply, from day to day, that the country will be turned over to barbarism—to the savages now within our own limits. Mexico cannot prevent it, because she is never free from civil war or other intestine commotions; and we cannot, at any cost short of hermetically sealing our frontier. Thus good neighborhood on either part, as matters at present stand, is next to an impossibility. The one cannot repel, and the other cannot pursue. The wild Indian in his forest wanderings has no respect for, if he even had a knowledge of, the lines which separate civilized nations. He roams wherever his untutored mind points the way, making in his strides the powerless—whether the white or the red man—his victim. Different—vastly different—is the condition of the neighborhood on our northern frontier. The inhabitants of the British Provinces are so assimilated in character and identified in interests with the inhabitants of the northern States, that they are much the same as if they constituted one people. Practically, there is nothing but a political line of division between them. The Marcy-Elgin treaty cemented their intercourse, and commercially annexed the Canadas, and other adjacent possessions of Queen Victoria, to those States. We gave to the colonies everything that they asked—everything that they could have desired.

The Senator from New York told us, the other day, in substance, that the North was mighty, and that it would speedily become still mightier. In the majesty of its power it may, at no distant day, bring those colonies into the Union, and particularly if they should become dissatisfied with the rule of the mother country. Nor can it be pleaded that they are not prepared for admission. Every day that passes—such is the frequency of their communication with the citizens of Michigan, New York, and New England—they receive practical lessons in the science of self-government, adopting, of course, the tenets of anti-slavery. Their number does not greatly exceed a third of that of Mexico, and yet they probably contribute ten times as much to the prosperity of the North as Mexico does to the prosperity of the South. I do not mention this in the language of sectional complaint, but in justification of the measure I propose.

The notion, sir, that Mexico will ever help herself out of the extremities to which she has been so deplorably reduced, is too absurd to be entertained by a rational mind. The more she struggles, ostensibly for the bettering of her condition, the more anarchical she becomes. To bring such a population as hers into the Union, would be to assume the gravest of responsibilities. To suffer her to be parceled out by filibusters—each chief perhaps a despot—would be to fraternize with every desperate adventurer in our own land, and to invite to our continent all the wild, vicious spirits of the other hemisphere. Nor could we consent, without palpable dishonor, to see her placed in the leading strings of any European Power, even were there a disposition manifested to so place her. We have, then, no alternative, if we put the slightest value upon our interests, and are not disposed to disregard our duty, but to arrange plans immediately for ruling her wisely, and, as far as possible, gently.

In the consummation of great measures, we are apt to be—perhaps a little too apt—a closely calculating people. In the matter of the proposed protectorate of Mexico, one of the first questions which is likely to suggest itself to our countrymen is that relating to the expenditure it will involve. Happily, this can be readily and satisfactorily answered.

The protectorate must be self-protecting—the expense incident to it defrayed by the protected. The general Government of Mexico could probably be administered, taking a term of ten years, for $6,000,000; while her customs receipts, under a well-regulated and honestly-administered revenue tariff, would double that amount. Our Gulf and Pacific squadrons would be ample for the protection of her commerce in those quarters, and without subjecting us to additional outlays. Five thousand reliable regular troops, properly garrisoned and distributed, would insure the establishment and preservation of internal order; and the adoption of a good police system would eventuate in bringing to justice and effectually subduing the rapacious and blood-thirsty bandits who infest her highways. Hence it is clear that we have it in our power to improve the condition of Mexico immeasurably; to breathe the breath of new life into her nostrils; and without incurring the risk of a dollar. What a salutary change would this be, not only for both countries, but for the world at large!

Faithless to her engagements, Mexico has been for a long time but little better than a national outlaw. She is powerful for the commission of wrongs, but powerless for their redress. Our Department of State is the repository for the grievances of our citizens by her high-handed deeds—but nothing more than a repository, since the securing of indemnities for outrages has become a somewhat obsolete idea. Those grievances are doubtless magnified in a pecuniary point of view, as grievances ever are where a Government is responsible; but still, there should be an authority in Mexico, with which they may be adjusted and provided for, as ascertained to be valid. The claimants might select one commissioner for their examination, Mexico another; and, in case of disagreement, the two an umpire. So with the inhabitants of other countries, who have experienced wrongs at her hands which have not been redressed. With respect to her funded debt, it amounts to about fifty-five million dollars, and is chiefly owned in England and on the continent. It was consolidated in 1846, by a convention between the Government of Mexico and a committee of the bond-holders, by which it was to bear five per cent. coupon interest. The war in which Mexico became involved with the United States, so enfeebled her that she was unable to provide the interest or a single dividend of it, until some time along in 1850, when she sent a commissioner to London to represent the state of her finances and to make a new proposal to her creditors. This proposal was to the end that she would pay out of the California indemnity money the interest in arrears, and pledge one fourth of the custom-house receipts on imports as well as exports for the payment of the future interest of the debt—provided the bond-holders would agree to diminish the rate of interest from five to three per cent. To this, after some hesitation, they consented. Since then, such is the faithlessness with which she has acted, and such the subterfuges that she has had to resort to, in order to sustain her sickly existence, that she has appropriated to herself nearly all the customs dues received—having remitted only a sufficient amount to pay four of the semi-annual three per cent. interest dividends which have since matured. With this arrangement, to which Mexico is bound, we could not interfere, as her protector, unless with the assent of the bond-holders. It might, however, probably be modified to their own and her advantage. The assumption of it by this Government, as a consequence of the protectorate, is too idle a supposition to be entertained. Great Britain could not expect more from us in the premises, than to see that the portion of the revenue from the customs stipulated for, was regularly placed at the disposal of those bond-holders when collected. This would in all likelihood defray the interest as it accrued, besides creating a sinking fund for the absorption, in a few years, of the principal, and thus extricate the hand of our unfortunate neighbor from the lion's mouth. England, as I shall presently show, would be well enough pleased to have it so extricated.

Mr. President, I have looked, but looked in vain, in both wings of this Capitol, for a fellow-member who was a fellow-member with me when the celebrated Monroe doctrine was announced. Of the two hundred and sixty-one Senators and Representatives who constituted the Congress which commenced its session on the first Monday of December, 1823, I stand here alone, and I will not disguise it, as one who regards himself as among the last of his race, as one who feels that he is approaching his journey's end on life's pilgrimage, and who has now no other ambition to gratify than to render "the State some service." All those worthy spirits, alas! have, one by one, quitted earth with the exception of President Buchanan, ex-President Van Buren, ex-Senator Branch, ex-Senator Rives, Governor Letcher, and Governor Wickliffe of Kentucky, Governor Johnson of Virginia, General Mercer, General Campbell of South Carolina, Mr. Saunders of North Carolina, Mr. Stuart of Pennsylvania, Mr. Blair of Tennessee, and possibly two or three others. To say nothing of the distinguished merits of the survivors, in that great Congress might have been seen in the full meridian of strong intellect, the Jacksons and Clays, the Websters and Randolphs, the Macons and Forsyths, the Bentons and Livingstons, the Barbours and Johnsons, the McLanes and McDuffies, the Kings and Smiths, the Taylors and Hamiltons, the Floyds and Holmeses, the Rugglesses and Bartlets. It was to such men, chosen alike for their wisdom and integrity, representing twenty-four sovereign States and thirteen millions of inhabitants, that Mr. Monroe (counseled by a Cabinet composed of John Quincy Adams, William H. Crawford, John C. Calhoun, Samuel L. Southard, William Wirt, and John McLean) addressed himself in such confident and resolute language with reference to the ulterior purposes of this country. I shall never cease to remember the exultant delight with which his noble sentiments were hailed.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 106.

They met not only with a cordial but an enthusiastic reception both in and out of Congress. They were approved with as much unanimity as if the entire population of the Union had been previously prepared to reëcho their utterance. At that glorious epoch, there was a broad, towering spirit of nationality extant. The States stood in the endearing relation to each other of ONE FOR ALL, AND ALL FOR ONE. The Constitution was their political text-book, the glory of the Republic their resolute aim. Practically, there was but one party, and that party animated by but one object—our upward and onward career. As if in atonement for the wrong inflicted upon the country by the angry Missouri controversy, which was then fresh in every mind, there seemed to be no circumscription to that genuine patriotism which everywhere within our embraces displayed itself. May we not trust, Mr. President, that a similar result will ensue from the still more angry Kansas controversy, and that the benign influences of such results will be as durable as creation? This will assuredly be the case if the only question asked within this Capitol when an embryo State asks for admission into the Union is: Does her constitution conform to the national requirement—"a republican form of government"? We have cheapened ourselves immensely in the world's esteem, and I fear polluted our system of government, in our extravagant disbursements, which have been overlooked, in the profitless strife which had its emanation in the hostility to the institution of negro slavery. Let each new State hereafter come slave or come free, as she chooses, and we shall henceforth have peace, the peace of union as contemplated by the authors and founders of our Republic. We have grander ends to attain than the frittering away of a healthful existence upon such loathsome, ignoble subjects. Our aspirations should be to spread our heaven-inspired principles by our lofty public bearing on to the most remote and benighted regions; proudly, in the rectitude of our intentions, taking our place at the very head of the nations of the earth. It is for us, if we are equal to our mission, to realize for America the poet's vision of the future of England:

"Wherever the bright sun of heaven shall shine,
Her honor and the greatness of her name
Shall be and make new nations; she shall flourish,
And like a mountain cedar, reach her branches
To all the plains about her."

But, sir, to return to the Monroe doctrine: in their notice of the message at the time it was promulgated, the then as now calm, observing editors of the National Intelligencer, remarked:

"It does honor to its author, and the most material parts are conceived in the true spirit of the days in which he first engaged in the scenes of public life."

Sir, that doctrine is, perhaps, quite familiar to every member of this Senate; but such has been my unrelaxing pride in it for nearly thirty-five years, increased, if possible, by the fact that I am the only person entitled to a seat in this building to whom it was addressed, that I cannot refrain from its perusal, nor from narrating its history, and explaining its purpose.

Our relations at that time were not in a satisfactory condition with the Emperor of all the Russias—the differences having grown out of a claim of that autocrat to a portion of this continent—and in this connection Mr. Monroe made the emphatic declaration:

"In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements in which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Power."

Subsequently, he reviewed the political condition of the two hemispheres, and referring to the desire of the Holy Alliance to reëstablish Spain in her late American possessions, he fearlessly stated that,

"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration, and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European Power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

"It is impossible that the allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent [American] without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."

Shortly after the settlement of Europe by the Congress of Vienna, the more despotic continental Governments suddenly became seriously troubled on account of the liberal sentiments which strikingly manifested themselves in Spain and elsewhere. The Holy Alliance, in its conferences at Troppau and Laybach, declared eternal hostility to all popular institutions, announcing its purpose to "repress republican opinions wherever they might be found, and to extinguish the feelings that prompted them." To use its avowed language:

"To preserve what is legally established was, as it ought to be, the invariable principle of their policy. Useful or necessary changes in legislation, and in the administration of States, ought only to emanate from the free will and the intelligent and well-weighed conviction of those whom God has rendered responsible for power."

The Czar of Russia had promised Ferdinand, of Spain, that if he would overthrow the constitution of that kingdom, he would assist him, not only in fortifying his throne, but also in reëstablishing his authority over the revolting Spanish American provinces. To this proposition England dissented in terms so decided as to cause its relinquishment—an occurrence not displeasing to Austria, as she was averse to the marching of a large Russian army across her bosom in the direction of the Pyrenees. But France, acting in the interest of the Holy Alliance, and probably with a view to selfish ulterior objects, determined to intervene in the affairs of Spain, and—under the alleged excuse to England that she wished to prevent the yellow fever, which was prevailing in Portugal, from entering her limits—she established an army on the confines of the Spanish realm, which she designated a "cordon sanitaire." The disappearance of the disease, however, from the peninsula, did not lead to its withdrawal; and subsequently she bestowed upon it the title of the "army of observation." But it was not long—in the summer of 1823—until she marched it over her boundary and undertook to control Spain. When, in 1808, Napoleon attempted to place the crown of that realm durably upon the head of his brother Joseph, he unquestionably contemplated the acquisition by his house of all the distant possessions. This idea might not have been the actuating one in the armed occupation of Spain by France; but it is certain that she regarded those possessions as a prize worth securing, if they could be obtained at a reasonable, or, indeed, an extravagant cost. She saw distinctly that they were as good as lost to the mother country, which was in a deplorable moral, financial, commercial, and physical condition. Mr. Canning, as Premier, made unceasing efforts to influence France to recall her army from Spain, but they were disregarded. This enlightened British statesman boldly arrayed his government against the principles of the Holy Alliance, and lost no suitable occasion to publicly proclaim the sentiments by which the British were animated—sentiments which were warmly responded to at home, and by the larger portion of the continental public. They were simply these, and, from their very nature, in violent antagonism with those entertained by the stipendiaries of the crowned head contrivers of the Congress of Verona: THE PEOPLE THE ORIGIN OF ALL POWER, THE OBJECT OF ALL GOVERNMENTS, THE GOOD OF THE GOVERNED.

Nor were suitable opportunities left unavailed of by the Premier, for strengthening and cementing the ties of friendship between his own and this country. In a speech which he delivered to his townsmen of Liverpool, on the 25th of August, 1823, at a banquet which they gave to Christopher Hughes, our excellent Minister to the Netherlands, he said, among other things:

"On such an occasion he might be permitted to express the gratification he felt, in common with the great mass of the intelligent and liberal men of both countries, to see the animosities necessarily attendant on a state of hostility so rapidly wearing away, and giving place to feelings so consonant to the true interests of the two nations, united by a common language, a common spirit of commercial enterprise, and a common regard for well-regulated liberty. It appeared to him that of two such nations the relative position was not wholly unlike that which occasionally occurred in families: where a child having, perhaps, displeased a parent—a daughter, for instance—in contracting a connection offensive to that parent's feelings, some estrangement would for awhile necessarily ensue; but, after a lapse of time, the irritation is forgotten, the force of blood again prevails, and the daughter and the mother stand together against the world."

About the time this speech was delivered Mr. Canning is reported to have had an interview with our Minister near the Court of St. James, in which he explained the policy of his Government with respect to Spain and the South American States, desiring the cooperation of the United States, if necessary in its enforcement. Our Minister, it appears, had no instructions upon the subject, but transmitted the proposal to Washington for consideration. On the 31st of March previous, the Prime Minister wrote to the British Minister at Madrid to intimate to the French Minister near that Court, in terms sufficiently distinct to admit of no misconception, that, while Great Britain utterly disclaimed any intention of appropriating to herself any of the former colonies or dependencies of Spain, she would not tacitly consent to their acquisition, or that of either of them, by France. This led to a conference between himself and the Prince de Polignac, the French Minister, on the 9th of October, 1823, in which the latter proposed:

"That in the interests of humanity, and especially in that of the Spanish Colonies, it would be worthy of the European Governments to concert together the means of calming, in those distant and scarcely-civilized regions, passions blinded by party spirit, and to endeavor to bring back to a principle of union in government, whether monarchical or aristocratical, people among whom absurd and dangerous theories were now keeping up agitation and disunion."

But the conference terminated without a result—Mr. Canning, no doubt, deeming it better to await intelligence from this capital relative to his proposal to our Minister. The world-renowned message contained Mr. Monroe's answer: It was as unexpected as a destructive earthquake, and dispelled every hope which had been indulged in Paris, and in autocratic circles elsewhere, of the reëstablishment of Spain in her lost possessions. It was thus that the triumph of England over the Holy Alliance was effected, as was explained when Parliament met in the following February, by the Marquis of Lansdowne in the House of Lords, and Mr. Brougham in the House of Commons.

In the discussion upon the speech from the throne, at the opening of the session, the Marquis observed, in the House of Lords, in commenting upon that part of it relating to the non-recognition of the Spanish-American States in terms of disapproval:

"But if we had been tardy, it was a satisfaction to find that America had on this occasion taken that decisive step which so well became its character and its interest. As that important decision was of the utmost consequence to every portion of the world where freedom was valued, he could not grudge to the United States the glory of having thus early thrown her shield over those struggles for freedom, which were so important, not merely to America herself, but to the whole world."

In the House of Commons, during the same day and in the same discussion, Mr. (now Lord) Brougham remarked:

"The Holy Alliance! [A cry of "Hear!"] What, was this designation of these sovereigns doubted? Why, it was not his, but that which they had given themselves. There was but one view that could be taken of that league of conspirators and of the motives of their alliance." * * *

 "The question, however, with regard to South America, he believed, was now disposed of, or nearly so; for an event had recently happened, than which no event had ever dispersed greater joy, exultation, and gratitude over all the freemen in Europe: an event in which he, as an Englishman, connected by ties of blood and language with America, took peculiar satisfaction. An event, he repeated, had happened which was decisive on that subject; and that event was the message of the President of the United States to Congress. The line of policy which that message disclosed became a great and independent nation; and he hoped his Majesty's ministers would be prevented by no mean pride or paltry jealousy from following so noble and illustrious an example. He trusted that, as the United States had had the glory of seating, we should have the good taste to follow, the example of holding fast by free institutions, and of assisting our brother freemen, in whatever part of the globe they should be found, in placing bounds to that iniquitous alliance which, if it ever succeeded in bringing down the Old World to its own degraded level, would not hesitate to attempt to master the New World too."

Mr. Canning, the Premier, in reply, stated that:

"In some of the principles laid down in the message of the President of the United States he entirely agreed; and he might be permitted to say that, long before the message went forth, it was distinctly admitted in the State Papers of Great Britain that the question between the mother country and the colonies was not a fit subject for foreign interference; but he did not agree in the principle that the parent State had not a right, if she could, to recover her own colonial dominions." [Mr. Brougham motioned that such a principle was not laid down.] "Mr. Canning, continuing: In the paper to which the honorable and learned gentleman referred, there was a passage which many individuals construed in that way, and he certainly understood the honorable and learned gentleman so to have construed it. He was clearly of opinion with the President of the United States, that no foreign State had a right to interfere, pending the dispute between the colonies and the mother country; but he was as strongly of opinion that the mother country had a right to attempt to recover her colonies if she thought proper."

Mr. Canning's construction of the message was clearly correct, as will have been seen from the extracts which I have read from that document. Spain, ruled by France, as the swordsmen of the Holy Alliance, was included in the declaration that—

"With the Governments who have declared their independence and maintain it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration, and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

It has often been asserted, sir, that Mr. Canning originated the Monroe doctrine. It has been seen to what extent he is entitled to that credit. The announcement of that doctrine, as valuable a purpose as it served his Government, perhaps took no one more by surprise than himself. Little could it have been imagined that a young republic, with nothing like half of its present population, could summon resolution to proclaim at the top of its voice, to all the potentates of the other hemisphere, in substance: "You may manage your affairs as you choose there, but you shall not carry your system, or systems, of government to the world of the West. With stout hearts and strong minds, and, above all, relying upon God's favor, we will prevent the establishment of any new European alliances in this hemisphere, or perish in the effort."

At the time of preparing his message, it may have been seen by Mr. Monroe that circumstances might arise rendering it necessary that the exercise of a controlling influence over one or another of those young republics would become a necessity on the part of this country. Mr. Clay, in his zeal for their recognition, has asserted in his place in the other House, that "it would be impugning the wisdom of Almighty God to suppose that he had created beings incapable of self-government;" but Mr. Monroe was not, perhaps, quite so sanguine. He, however, was determined, as far as his official influence could be advantageously employed, in the instance of those republics, that the experiment should have a fair trial. But, if it should result in failure, no foreign Power should attempt their resubjugation. It would become a duty, under our mantle, to nourish, cherish, and protect such as could not take care of themselves. The unlocking of the rich, varied, natural stores of Mexico, would redound not only to an enlarged welfare of that country, but to the good of every country interested in commerce and in enlightened civilization. She is, literally, the thriftless "talent tied up in a napkin." She can never be otherwise until we exercise a controlling influence over her. We must make her respectable and respected. She has been going down so long that she is incapable of rising. With life and property secure, it is estimated that she could produce $100,000,000 of silver annually. Instead of fifteen or twenty miles of railroads, she might, in a score of years, have as many hundred. With such an attractive climate and fruitful soil and variegated scenery, she would become the center of fashionable travel, and the abode of enterprising industry; and the occurrence would not only command the approval, but also the admiration of Great Britain and other European States. The London Times, which molds rather than follows public opinion, says:

"There is not a statesman who would wish to see Great Britain hamper herself with an inch of Mexican ground. Let the United States, when they are finally prepared for it, enjoy all the advantages and responsibility of ownership, and our merchants at Liverpool and elsewhere will be quite content with the trade that may spring out of it. The capacity of the Mexican population, for appreciating a constitutional rule, is not so remarkable that we should volunteer to administer it."

The Monroe doctrine has been repeatedly ridiculed of recent years, and by grave Senators, as the merest of abstractions—as unmeaning as valueless. But let me tell you, sir, that, but for that doctrine, Texas, probably, had never entered your Confederacy. Canning might have yielded to Polignac for the consolidation of a monarchical or aristocratical form of government for the ci-devant colonies of Spain, by which, of course, she would have been included as one of those colonies, had it not been for the seasonable declaration of that doctrine, and the thrill of joyous delight with which it was hailed by the votaries of liberty everywhere. On this account alone I may be pardoned for fancying that it is deserving of a worthier designation, even by the most violent tongue, than an abstraction. When Cortez returned to Madrid from his conquering expedition to America, he went to Court. The haughty Charles V., observing his stately mein, as he approached him, emphatically demanded: "Who are you, sir?" "The man," replied he, "who has given you more provinces than your ancestors left you cities!"

With equal truth may it be said of Texas, that she has been instrumental in giving the Union more dollars than its founders left it cents. She has been instrumental in developing its resources more in twelve years than had been previously developed in sixty. I do not mention this in a spirit of vain glory. Who could be vain-glorious of such a State?—a State that is advancing with giant's strides in all that constitutes a State, to the head of the column of the southern division of the Union? The time may come—yes, will come, sir—when, if she shall be as properly cared for by this Government, in her intercourse with Mexico, as New York has been cared for in her intercourse with the British Provinces, she may be to that division what the Empire State is to the northern division. But, whatever her future power, I trust that the language of her sons will ever be, in contradistinction to the supercilious expressions which fell from the lips of a distinguished Senator a few days ago, as far as concerns the exercise of might for the purpose of sectional oppression:

"O! 'tis excellent
 To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
 To use it like a giant."

Whenever one section of this country presumes upon its strength for the oppression of the other, then will our Constitution be a mockery, and it would matter not how soon it was severed into a thousand atoms and scattered to the four winds. If the principles are disregarded upon which the annexation of Texas was consummated, there will be for her neither honor nor interest in the Union; if the mighty, in the face of written law, can place with impunity an iron yoke upon the neck of the weak, Texas will be at no loss how to act, or where to go, before the blow aimed at her vitals is inflicted. In a spirit of good faith she entered the Federal fold. By that spirit she will continue to be influenced until it is attempted to make her the victim of Federal wrong. As she will violate no Federal rights, so will she submit to no violation of her rights by Federal authority. The covenant which she entered into with the Government must be observed, or it will be annulled. Louisiana was a purchase, California, New Mexico, and Utah a conquest; but Texas was a voluntary annexation. If the condition of her admission is not complied with on the one part, it is not binding on the other. If I know Texas, she will not submit to the threatened degradation foreshadowed in the recent speech of the Senator from New York. She would prefer restoration to that independence which she once enjoyed, to the ignominy ensuing from sectional dictation. Sorrowing for the mistake which she had committed in sacrificing her independence at the altar of her patriotism, she would unfurl again the banner of the "lone star" to the breeze, and reënter upon a national career, where, if no glory awaited her, she would at least be free from a subjection by might to wrong and shame.

But I will dismiss such thoughts from my mind, and indulge in their stead the pleasing belief that the Federal Constitution, the Constitution of our fathers, the Constitution of compromise between conflicting interests, will ever be found potent enough to overpower the most formidable sectional opposition which may be advanced against its provisions. Beyond it, there would be but little left worth living for.

In conclusion, I trust, sir, that you will pass the resolution which I now send to the Secretary. Of the form of the protectorate, I have said comparatively nothing. It will be for the committee, if ordered, to decide upon that, with such lights as may be placed before it. I have no preferences on the subject. It may assimilate to that of Great Britain over the Ionian Isles, or be entirely original in its character. No advantages in trade-intercourse ought to be claimed by us which should not become common to other countries, and no more authority exercised than would be indispensable to secure obedience to salutary law.

I send to the Chair a preamble and resolution as a substitute for that which I before offered. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, the events connected with the numerous efforts of the people of Mexico to establish upon a reliable basis an orderly system of self-government have invariably resulted in complete failure; and whereas, the condition of Mexico is such as to excite alarming apprehensions that she may precipitate herself into a wild condition of anarchy, and the more so as she has demonstrated, from time to time, her utter inability to suppress intestine commotions, and to conquer the hordes of bandits by which she is infested; and whereas, the United States of America, on account of the continental policy which they cherish and desire to enforce, can never permit Mexico to be resubjugated by Spain, or placed under the dominion of any foreign Power; and whereas, one of the most important duties devolving upon civilized Governments is to exact from adjoining nations the observances of good neighborhood, thus shielding themselves against impending, or even remote injury to their border security: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be raised, to inquire into, and report to the Senate, whether or not it is expedient for the Government of the United States of America to declare and maintain a protectorate over the so-called Republic of Mexico, in such form, and to such an extent, as shall be necessary to secure to this Union good neighborhood, and to the people of said country the benefits of orderly and well-regulated republican government.

Mr. HUNTER. I call now for the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. I gave way for the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. HOUSTON. It will not take a moment, I hope.

Mr. SEWARD. The Senator from Virginia will allow me to suggest that the resolution must, of course, lie over for one day—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON in the chair.) The Chair will suggest that it is offered as a substitute by way of amendment to a resolution heretofore offered.

Mr. SEWARD. I move, then, that it lie on the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858; the pending question being on the following amendment offered by Mr. HALE:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by any officer or agent of the Government, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and the sixth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved May 1, 1820, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I listened very attentively to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] yesterday, and I feel with him that there is a mischief, in regard to these deficiency bills to be remedied. I think, perhaps, he took an extreme view of the question when he supposed that they were unconstitutional in their character; nor do I apprehend he would find on further examination that the first instance in which bills of that nature were ever passed was in 1844. Perhaps that was the first occasion on which a bill of that name was ever passed; but bills of that nature have often been passed from the year 1820 up to this time. I think, too, he will find, when he comes to examine this whole question, that the measure which he proposes is not only too radical, but that it will fail to accomplish his object, and that it would make inefficient the machinery of this Government in that very point in which it requires most efficiency—I mean in its military arm.

I feel with him, sir, that these deficiency bills, if possible, ought to be prevented; and I am willing to concur in any practicable, sound measure which may have that end for its object, and which may be likely to attain it; but, I think, it will be found that the remedy, if there be one, will lie elsewhere. These deficiency bills arose from a change in the fiscal year. In 1842 the fiscal year was made to commence on the 1st of July instead of the 1st of January. Before that time, when the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, it had been the habit of Congress to pass two sets of appropriation bills, just as we do now, but the names were different. The first which was passed early in the session, to meet the temporary want of the Government, was called the partial appropriation bill; and the other, which was passed later in the session, and provided for the additional wants of the fiscal year, was called the bill for additional appropriations. It is only necessary to turn to the synoptical index of the statutes, to see that, from the year 1820, it was the constant practice to pass these two appropriation bills: the first a partial bill, which answered to our deficiency bill, according to the present practice; the other, what was called the bill for additional appropriations, which provided for the general wants of the Government.

The difference between the practice of the two, however, was probably essential. When the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, the appropriations preceded the expenditures, or rather, the contracts to expend money. Since the fiscal year has been changed, the expenditure of the money, or the contract to expend it, generally preceded the appropriation, and it is for this reason, as things are now arranged, the Secretaries have to estimate for eighteen months ahead—Congress always appropriates a year in advance. It cannot be foreseen accurately what are the wants of the Government. The only way in which you could prevent these deficiency bills, would be to appropriate extravagantly under each specific head of appropriation, so as to be sure that the Government would have enough, and something to spare to provide for contingencies, the effect of all of which would be that we should swell the appropriation bills very largely; we should increase the temptation to large expenditures, and probably it would lead to large and lavish expenditures. It would have, too, this further effect, that the change which was made in ancient times from general to specific appropriations, would work to extravagance rather than economy. For the first three years after this Government went into operation, the appropriation bills were in the general; it was only in the fourth year that Congress commenced with specific appropriations.

To say, then, that there shall be no deficiency bill; that we must either provide more than a year beforehand for all the wants of the Government, or else that no expenditures shall be made, must subject the Government, in its practical operations, to great inconvenience, sometimes, perhaps, bringing it to a stand-still or else it must force upon Congress the necessity of appropriating not only enough, but something to spare, upon each specific head or appropriation.

Now, sir, if there be a remedy, it seems to me that it will be found in restoring the fiscal year to the period at which it formerly commenced. If that be done, the appropriations can be made ahead of the expenditures. We meet a little before the fiscal year closes, and if there was an urgent demand for temporary supplies, we could pass a partial bill, as was passed before this change, in order to meet those temporary wants, and take time to consider the other appropriations. During the long session, the last appropriation would be made only a few months before we meet again; and thus Congress could always provide for the probable wants of the Government; and it would be great mismanagement, great neglect, and probably culpable misconduct, if the contracts for expenditure then preceded the appropriations. I do not know, sir, that it would make us more economical, though I rather think it would; but it would, at least, introduce this salutary change—that the appropriation would precede the expenditure. So strongly am I impressed with this, that unless reasons should be urged against it which I do not now see, I shall test the sense of the Senate upon the subject by presenting a bill for the purpose of restoring the old fiscal year.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this stage of his remarks, to which I am listening with much attention?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the whole appropriations be in advance of the expenditures, what difference does it make whether the appropriations be made at one portion of the fiscal year or another? Why is it a matter of any consequence?

Mr. HUNTER. Because Congress will be in session at a period near the end of the fiscal year if it ends at the one time rather than the other. Under the present system, we have to make appropriations more than a year ahead; but if we restore the old fiscal year, as we meet a month before it closes, we have time to provide for any temporary emergency, and during the long session we sit until the year is half over, and we have only to provide for six months ahead of us. But as it now stands, the Secretaries have to estimate for eighteen months ahead, and Congress have to provide for more than twelve months ahead of them. The consequence is, that unexpected and unforeseen emergencies arise, and the Departments are either obliged to permit the public service to suffer, or else they have to contract ahead of the appropriations. But they would have no such excuse when Congress was in session, perhaps, only six months before the close of the fiscal year, and when it always would meet again a month ahead of it. Certain it is that, in former times, what might seem to be deficiencies, through the whole experience of the Government until this change was made, will be found to have been very small. In general, the partial appropriation bill consisted chiefly of provisions for the expenditures of the two Houses of Congress, and occasionally a small deficiency would come in. Sometimes you would find an appropriation for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, sometimes an appropriation for a contingency in this department or that; but in general there was very little appropriation in these partial appropriation bills for any other purpose than for the expenses of the two Houses of Congress. It was so because Congress was in session so near the end of the fiscal year that it could provide with sufficient certainty. We certainly can see six months or twelve months ahead of us more easily than we can see for a year or eighteen months ahead of us.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator be kind enough to state what were the particular inducements for changing the fiscal year at the time the change was made?

Mr. HUNTER. I do not recollect. I think myself the chief inducement was this: there was a pressure on Congress to pass the partial appropriation bill; it was necessary to pass it a little sooner than Congress generally gets to work; there was some slight inconvenience in that regard, and it pressed upon members of Congress, for generally the partial appropriation bill was made chiefly to provide for the wants of the two Houses of Congress. But there may have been other reasons which do not now occur to me. I intend to examine into that matter, for I am convinced (I have a right to think so because I find this difference in the experience under the old fiscal year and under the present) there is reason for the difference, and unless I can find some more reason against the change than I see now, I shall test the sense of the Senate upon that subject. I believe that probably we may prevent the deficiency bills, if not entirely, certainly to a large extent. I would say we might prevent them entirely if we had no more territory to provide for than we had at that time. The cause which may occasion a necessity for such bills is that we have distant territories—territories on the Pacific—and it takes months to hear from them. Sudden emergencies arise there, and it is very difficult to prevent the occurrence of some deficiencies there. For instance, we shall have an application during this session for deficiencies that occurred in Washington and Oregon Territories under such circumstances as these: the Indians are brought on reservations to be supported by what is made there, with the exception of the hunting season when they are turned loose to hunt. This, of course, diminishes the expense of supporting them; but when a war occurred, the officers were afraid to turn them loose and were obliged to support them the whole time. This was unexpected and unforeseen. They could not do it without exceeding the appropriation, and if they did not do it they would have had to turn the Indians loose and run the risk of their joining the bands which were already making war upon the settlers.

There is, too, another cause of deficiencies which might still entail them upon us to some extent, but not so largely, I think not near so largely, if we were to change the fiscal year, as it does now. Of necessity there must be a right in the War Department to contract for the means of subsistence and transportation ahead of appropriations. How can it be otherwise? Suppose insurrection or invasion were to occur in the recess of Congress—an event for which they had not provided in their appropriations—what is the President to do? To wait until he can call Congress together for an appropriation? No. It is indispensable to lodge power in him to contract for the means of transportation and subsistence; and that is all that is lodged in him. Whatever could be retained under the action of Congress, under our existing laws is retained. All appropriations for pay and clothing, &c., are retained; but it was necessary to leave this discretion in him, and you could not make the machinery of this Government practicable and operative in time of war without it; and we can readily see that there are emergencies which might occur, not only in war but in peace, with so much territory as we now have, with troops posted so far apart as they now are, requiring a change of those posts and an increased amount of transportation, which was not foreseen when the regular appropriations were made.

Why, sir, I have been told by the Secretary of War, during this very fiscal year, that owing to some Indian outbreaks, and the modes in which the troops were posted, he had suddenly and unexpectedly to move some troops from Old Point, on the Chesapeake, to our western frontier. How can you provide for such emergencies as these in the regular appropriation bills? In no other way, as I said before, except by appropriating, not only what we think is enough, but more besides, to meet the case of these emergencies. Far better than to pursue a practice which would lead to such extravagance as that, it would be to lodge the limited power in his hands that was vested there by the act of 1820. It was vested there after experience. It was suggested by the experience of the last war with Great Britain. I believe that if you were to repeal it, the effect would be that you would either entail upon the military arm of this service such inefficiency, and expose the country to such disasters on certain occasions as to bring down public indignation, or else you would have to make these contracts without law. Far better, then, is it to limit the War Department as the law now does limit the other Departments—limit them wherever it can be done, and give the Secretary of War this authority in relation to transportation and subsistence.

The Senator from New Hampshire, however, says this is unconstitutional. I think not. It is unconstitutional to draw money out of the Treasury without an appropriation; nor is it ever done; but it is not unconstitutional to make contracts ahead of the appropriations. There certainly is a distinction in regard to that matter; but even in relation to these deficiency bills, it will be found that they are not always for money that has been spent, or contracted to be expended, ahead of the appropriations. Sometimes they are for that; but very often they are an application for an additional appropriation, not to supply moneys that have been expended, but moneys which the Secretary desires to expend in some department of the public service, in addition to what has been already provided. Many of them, instead of being appropriations for deficiencies, are additional appropriations. I believe the Departments have, in many instances, done wrong in their estimates by not so denominating them, instead of calling them deficiencies.

But, Mr. President, if we are to maintain the present fiscal year, if we are to continue the practice of estimating eighteen months ahead and appropriating more than a year ahead, sometimes sixteen months ahead, when we have to estimate and to appropriate by guess and conjecture, then it is almost indispensable, for economy's sake, that we should use to a limited extent this device of a deficiency bill. I will give an instance—an instance that has occurred since I have been connected with the Committee on Finance. Some years since the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives found the estimates from the Navy and War Departments, as they believed, too large. They addressed letters to the heads of those Departments asking them to diminish their estimates. The reply was that they had been made upon consideration, and they could not diminish them. The committee then addressed letters to the Departments saying they had determined to diminish the amount appropriated, and requesting a designation of the items on which they would have the appropriations cut down. One Secretary did designate, but the other Secretary would not, because he thought every cent he asked was necessary. The Committee of Ways and Means took the responsibility of cutting them down arbitrarily, because they knew that if it turned out that more was actually wanted for the public service, they could, in the shape of a deficiency bill, at the next session provide for it. Suppose it had been that there could be no such bill; suppose it had been considered unconstitutional, and penalties were attached to public officers who should undertake, for any cause, to contract ahead of appropriations: no committee could have ventured on any such experiment, no committee could have taken such a responsibility, because it was saying that they knew, twelve or sixteen months ahead, what would be the wants of the War or Navy Departments better than the heads of these Departments themselves. If the committees cannot do that, it is impossible that Congress can retrench the expenditures. If the committees cannot occasionally apply the knife and retrench arbitrarily, we here can make no sensible retrenchment. Now and then we may lay hand on an item which we can prove to be unnecessary, and strike it out, but in the general, they are so connected, so interwoven, so interdependent upon each other, that you cannot intelligently strike one out.

The only way I know would be (and I very much incline to think we shall have to resort to some such remedy in order to stop expenditures) to send a resolution to the heads of Departments, saying: "We have so much money to spend; we are willing to appropriate so many millions to you; now send in the estimates, and show us how you will have that amount divided; we are willing to leave it to you." In that way we should accomplish, in some measure, the superior economy of general appropriations; for there is no doubt, if our agents were perfect, were impeccable, we should conduct the Government more economically with general than with specific appropriations. In that way we might combine that matter of economy, in some degree, with the responsibility of specific appropriations. If you were to go to the heads of Departments and say: "We will give you half the money that is appropriated to carry on and conduct your Department; employ your clerks for what you choose; give them what you choose; employ what force you think necessary;" I believe there is not a Department here that could not be as well, and probably better administered, for half the money now expended on them.

But, sir, putting that aside, I return to the point that, if we declare that we will pass no deficiency bill, that we will not pass it because it tends to encourage extravagance, or because we think it unconstitutional, (an opinion in which I do not concur,) then the only resort that is left to us is to turn in and swell the amounts appropriated under each specific head. I need not say to what that would lead.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish, in that connection, to ask the gentlemen another question, and that is, if we preserve the power of transferring appropriations, what is the advantage of specific appropriations?

Mr. HUNTER. The power of general transfer is not given. The power of transfer is given only in certain cases under the law. There is the difference; so that it still keeps the appropriations specific. Not only that, but it is a power which the Secretaries exercise sparingly. For some reason or other, they do not transfer even where under the law they might do so, but rather apply for an increase of some specific appropriation which has fallen short, although there is a balance on another. Consequently, if the gentleman will study the history of the appropriation bills—a very dry and uninteresting subject, I acknowledge—he will find that, wherever we have these periodical fits of economy, (and I wish they would become chronic,) amendments are stuck about in the appropriation bills providing that the Secretaries may transfer from one head of expenditure to another: and why? Because Congress cannot then begin to look into the matter closely, and they find that, although there is not enough here, there is an unexpended balance under another head; and they say, why do not the Secretaries use that? and, by way of admonishing them to use that, they put in a clause allowing them to transfer from one head to another.

Mr. COLLAMER. And that defeats the specific character of the appropriations altogether.

Mr. HUNTER. It does when the power is given in general terms, as it is sometimes given; but, after a while, you find that the pendulum swings the other way; for I suppose there have been at least twenty provisions in regard to this matter, sometimes enlarging, sometimes diminishing. Sometimes it takes the turn which it seems about to take now, and you limit the power of transfer. The whole effect of that is, that when you limit the power of transfer, and force appropriations to be more and more specific, you appropriate more money. Perhaps you get more responsibility, but you certainly appropriate more money; so that you have to choose between the two. There is Scylla on the one side, and Charybdis on the other. You have to choose between the two; to act in reference to the combined considerations of responsibility in the head of the Department on the one hand, and economy on the other.

But, sir, be that as it may, whether I am right or wrong in these views which I have suggested, I think I cannot be wrong in saying that it is absolutely necessary to leave in the hands of the War Department the power in relation to contracts for subsistence and transportation which the law has placed there, and that if we were to take it away we should run the risk of embarrassing it more seriously in times of emergency, or else we should force it to act against law and without law, and thus set the worst of examples before the country. I hope that the Senate will not, without consideration, make this radical change in the machinery of our Government. It is a dangerous thing to depart from the long-settled maxims of experience. The law of 1820 was introduced from a sense of necessity; it was founded upon the experience of the Government in time of war, and I have never before known an effort to repeal this particular provision. I have no doubt that if the Senate were to do it, the repeal would either be a dead letter, or we should expose ourselves to the most serious embarrassments.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the Senator from Virginia, in his wish that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should not be adopted by the Senate. We had this whole subject discussed very fully in the Senate about six years ago, and some reforms, as they were thought, were then introduced. We passed an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, which prevented the transfer of funds, as a general thing, from one branch of the service to another. That was the subject of debate, as also this clause, in the act of 1820, by which the right was reserved to the War Department of making contracts without authority of law, or without appropriations first made by Congress for certain branches of the public service. Well, sir, as the Senator from Virginia just now observed, this provision of the act of 1820 was founded upon the knowledge which experience had given to us. It was passed during Mr. Monroe's administration; and the Senate will recollect that he was acting as Secretary of War during a considerable portion of the latter part of the war of 1812, and I presume that those who are conversant with the affairs of that period must be aware that Mr. Monroe had to make contracts for the support of the Army without authority of law, and to throw himself upon the country for his justification under the public necessity which urged him so to do.

In 1820, when Mr. Monroe was President, he himself, as I have understood, suggested the amendment in the act of 1820 by which this authority was reserved to the War Department, for very obvious reasons. It is impossible to tell in advance what the exigencies of the service may require in regard to the support of the Army. You cannot tell whether a foreign foe, or a domestic one, in the shape of wild Indians, may not seize upon your convoys of provisions. In that case, if your War Department is not authorized to make purchases of provisions without a previous appropriation or law authorizing them, your Army will starve. Their clothing may be required to be renewed at a time when there is no appropriation for it. So of the covering of the Army—by which I mean the tents. Besides, it is impossible to tell how the troops may be directed to move, and what cost of transportation may necessarily follow. It is because of the impossibility of understanding beforehand what these exigencies may require in this respect, that the authority is given to the War Department to make these contracts after the manner specified in the act of 1820.

Now, sir, I do not propose to argue this subject at length, because it seems to me the considerations are very palpable, and must strike any one who will examine the question; but I will suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, that if his object is a substantial, temperate reform, he may accomplish it by an amendment of the law, by adding a requirement, by which it shall become the duty of the President, whenever any such contract shall be made under the authority of the sixth section of the act of May 1, 1820, to report specifically all the facts attending the making of such contracts, and the reason and necessity for them to Congress. That certainly will make the responsibility more direct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a provision of that sort somewhere now. I have seen it.

Mr. PEARCE. There is a general provision in regard to all contracts made; but what I suggest—and I am not aware that there is any such provision in the law now—is that there shall be a report of the contracts made under authority of this section of the act of 1820, that would bring the subject immediately, with all the reasons and circumstances, to the notice and knowledge of Congress. Congress might then see whether this authority had been abused or not. I admit, sir, that it is an authority liable to abuse; but what is there that is human, and which is confided as everything must be confided, to the discretion of some one, which is not liable to abuse? You cannot avoid that liability unless you cut up, root and branch, the entire service. I do not think it is advisable to repeal this section.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Virginia, who has suggested a change in the commencement of the fiscal year, at what time the appropriations for the present fiscal year were made? Were they not made at the last session?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. When would they have been made, if the fiscal year had commenced on the 1st of January, instead of the 1st of July? Would it not have been at that session?

Mr. HUNTER. Under the present fiscal system, they must always be made more than a year ahead. When the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, they were never made as much as a year ahead.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose the present fiscal year, which commenced on the 1st of July, 1857, had commenced on the 1st of January, 1857: when would the appropriations for it have been made?

Mr. HUNTER. Last year was the short session. They probably would have been made in the last of February, or beginning of March.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then that would have been two months after the fiscal year began. If the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, and you made your appropriations for it at the end of February, 1857, would not that have been two months after the year began?

Mr. HUNTER. I stated that there was a partial appropriation bill which might be passed in December to meet the wants of the Government for those two months, until the general bill could be passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the very fact which I wanted to call to the attention of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia said these deficiency bills had been frequent in time past; but the fact was that those deficiency bills, as he calls them, were for the two first months of the fiscal year that had not been provided for. They were new appropriations, not deficiency bills; and it was the difficulty of providing the appropriations in season, the commencement of the session being on the 1st of December, and the fiscal year commencing in January, that led to changing the commencement of the fiscal year to the 1st of July, leaving the entire session of Congress in which to make the appropriations. Therefore, the reason which the Senator assigns for the present immense deficiency bills fails; they could not have originated from any such cause as he supposes in times past. They result from a change in the character of the administration of the Government—not the change of the fiscal year. Now I should like to ask the Senator how it is that the appropriations are made eighteen months ahead, as he says. At the last session, Congress made the appropriations for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say the appropriations were made eighteen months ahead, but the estimates are. They come in on the 1st of December, six months ahead of the commencement of the fiscal year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to call the attention of the Senator to his proposition for changing the fiscal year. He says he will do that as a means of relieving us from these deficiency bills. Now, Mr. President, there is a year's service estimated for prior to the commencement of this session of Congress that we are now in; to bring it home to ourselves—and we can understand it better in that way—that is, a year's service commencing on the 1st of July next, and ending July 1, 1859. There is in every appropriation bill an amount sufficient for every Department for a year; when five months of the year have gone by, Congress comes here again; and if we cannot come as near as five is to twelve in providing for a year, I think we must be very thick-headed. Here is a deficiency bill of $7,000,000 for the Army; and that Department must have exhausted all the appropriations for the year ending July 1, 1858. We are asked for $7,000,000 of deficiencies; and I do not know but that we were asked for it the first day we got here. I do not know when this commenced. I do not know but that this deficiency was ascertained and reported to Congress at the commencement of the session, when only five months of the fiscal year had expired.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator is mistaken. These deficiencies were not reported in the annual estimates. They were reported by special estimate afterwards; nor are they all deficiencies. They are some of them additional appropriations, and if passed, some of them would be deducted from the annual appropriations for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand; and if they are appropriations going into the next fiscal year, they are improperly called deficiencies—most assuredly they are. They are either appropriations for this year, to make up deficiencies in the appropriations which were made at the last session, or they are improperly in this bill. If they are appropriations for the next year, let them go into the next year's bill; they do not belong here. That is my notion about it, and I suppose the Senator from Virginia will agree with me.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Rhode Island knew the reason, I think he would not express that opinion. We are asked to make these additional appropriations a year ahead, because we can transport the provisions to Utah more cheaply when there is grass on the plains, and the teams can be subsisted on it as they go, than if we wait until that has disappeared. It is because it is more economical to make them ahead, that they are now asked. In regard to the name, I acknowledge it is not a deficiency, if that is what the gentleman sticks upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir; I never stickle about names. What I mean to say is, that if we should make an appropriation for the year ending on the 1st of July, 1859, at an earlier period than usual, on account of the grass, let us make it at an earlier period on account of the grass, and not call it a deficiency. I do not see that there was any necessity for making contracts a year ahead, or before this bill had passed. I cannot conceive of that necessity. But what I spoke of was in reference to calling the attention of the Senator from Virginia to a mistake that I thought he had made as to the convenience of having the fiscal year end on the 30th of June instead of the 31st of December. It was a uniform difficulty to prepare the estimates of appropriations in the course of the month of December, for the entire year then to come; and for the partial appropriations, as he calls them, there was a proper appropriation bill, and afterwards an additional appropriation bill. For that reason the system was changed, and, I think, judiciously changed. Everybody must see that we are now, at this day in April, yet without the appropriation bills passed; and, if the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, three or four months would have elapsed before we got any appropriations; so that there is no reason for a change. Such a change would not remove the difficulty; and I think the Senator will admit that we should be hurried to make the appropriations in the four weeks of December, instead of having five months, as we now have, in which to make them.

With respect to the provision of the law of 1820, I can see no difficulty that would result from the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, except in a time of war, and if the bill is about to be adopted, it ought to have that provision in it. No forecast can provide against contingencies that may happen during a foreign war. Nor can I understand myself what is supposed to have been the difficulty that suggested this exception in the law. The Senator from Virginia says that the experience of the war of 1812 had suggested this modification. I do not know that there ever was such a law before 1820. Perhaps there was; but if this is the first law that limited the discretion of the Departments in this respect, it is very singular that there should be an exception that was suggested when there was no law that limited the discretion. It does not purport to be the amendment of a law; and we went through the war of 1812, it seems, without such a limitation on the discretion of the President or the Departments; and when Congress made this law, it was probably suggested to omit the matter of supplies and transportation for convenience, because then the fiscal year commenced on the 1st of January, and Congress only met four weeks before, and it was a nice point to calculate when eleven months of one year remained before Congress would be together. But is there any such trouble in calculating expenditures when we are to meet within five months after the fiscal year begins? There is no such trouble; and I say there is no man worthy of a seat in any Department of this Government who cannot estimate its expenditures so as not to be deficient before Congress comes together, when less than half the year has expired; and I think the Senator from Virginia will agree with me that there is no danger of any inconvenience from it, except in time of war; and in time of war we might very easily confer this discretion.

I am willing to give enough to fight the enemies of the country to the best advantage, and not think much about the cost. That is my opinion about fighting; but in time of peace, piling up these little petty expenditures for the purpose of making contracts, and making contracts for the purpose of getting votes to carry expenditures, is what I do not like. I want some restraint on them. I do not like the notion of men making contracts on account of the grass being more favorable in winter than it will be after the next July. If there are any real deficiencies, I am always ready to vote them; I am not going to cavil about a few dollars. I think we ought to make fair, liberal, and just appropriations; make them in season, and support the Government, and sustain it in every department, and not be higgling about small sums. But then I want to hold the heads of Departments to a just responsibility as to their estimates, and as to the execution of the appropriations we make. I do not understand, and cannot understand, by what authority an Executive Department of this Government says, when five months of the year have gone by, "we will transfer seventeen millions of the appropriations of last year over to the expenditures of the next year." Why, sir, we might as well not have any Congress if we allow that to be done. I see in the Treasury report, made on the 8th of December last, that there were somewhere between sixteen and seventeen millions of appropriations for this present year that we are going through, that had been decided to be postponed until the next fiscal year. Where is the authority to do it? I should like to know. When we undertake to appropriate money for a year, to be expended in that year, we do it with some intelligence, I take it. We think it ought to be appropriated and it ought to be expended; and the Executive is the man to carry out the will of Congress in that matter, and he has no more right to carry up seventeen millions of appropriations to another year than he has to put his hand into the Treasury and take seventeen millions out of it. I do not mean to hold him to any nicety about these matters; but when I see millions appropriated by Congress last year, to be expended in that year, carried over in a lump to be expended in the next year, I want to know what authority there is for it, and I should like the Senator from Virginia to enlighten me, because this is a new thing in my experience; I never knew it to be done before.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator had looked to the law providing for the surplus fund, he would have found that it is especially provided that an appropriation may be used for two years, and after that time it goes to the surplus fund, and cannot be used. There is express law for it; and where there are outstanding balances for one year applicable to another year under that law, the Secretary refers to that fact as a reason why he diminishes his estimate for that service. There is a law for it, and always has been.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement in the Treasury report was, that there were $17,000,000 of the appropriation for the year ending the 1st of July, 1858, that would be carried over to the year ending the 1st of July, 1859. There may be some floating balances, for all I know; but I noticed that there was one item alone of two or three million dollars, appropriated to public buildings, that was to be carried over. I have no objection to its being carried over, if there is no money; but the reason ought to be assigned why it is not spent in the year in which it is appropriated to be expended. That is what I want. If the President had said, "here are two, three, or four million dollars appropriated for public buildings; we are short of money, and I concluded not to expend it," that would be a good reason. But this mere carrying it over without assigning any reason, is what I complain of. It is of the same character with the making of contracts committing the faith of the Government to expenditures without authority.

I have no disposition to complain of these things; but if we undertake to define the duties of the Executive Departments of this Government; if we take the obligation upon ourselves to make the appropriations intelligently, we ought to confine the officers—no matter how high they are in authority—to carrying out the true intent and meaning of the law. As I said before, I can see no practical difficulty in any Secretary of War, or Secretary of the Navy, making proper estimates when we meet here, before one half the fiscal year has expired. If these contracts were made since Congress came together, without notice to Congress that the appropriation was exhausted, they were improperly made—there is no doubt about that. We were here, and it was the duty of the President or his Secretary to tell us that he needed a further appropriation for transportation, clothing, &c.; that it had been exhausted on account of the troubles in Utah; and to ask for an appropriation. Was not that within his competency? Was there any inconvenience in it?

I have no motive to make any charge against the Secretaries at the head of our Departments. I do not know who these contractors are; I pay very little attention to these matters. My attention would not have been called to them but for the remarks made by the Senator from Virginia, who went back to the change of the fiscal year to cover up what I suppose to be a very improper contract made when Congress was together without consulting Congress. I should like to know what the appropriations for the War Department were last year, for this item of transportation and subsistence—perhaps many millions. If, on the 8th of December that fund was exhausted, was it not the duty of the President and Secretaries, in making their reports, and submitting their estimates to us, to state that these items of appropriation were exhausted during the first five months of the year, and to ask an early appropriation to supply the deficiencies for this year, and not have made contracts until they got an appropriation? If we had refused to make the appropriation, the responsibility would have rested on us. I have no idea that the Congress of the United States would refuse in such a case. At any rate my deliberate judgment is, that the power to refuse is with us, and with no other body. I am not going to part with it on any pretense about altering the fiscal year, or the end of it, or the beginning of it. I mean to hold this power as long as I sit here; I mean to deal liberally with all the Departments of this Government, but I mean to hold them to the responsibility that the Constitution has imposed upon them; that is, that they shall have the appropriations before they make the expenditures, and that they shall not commit the faith of this Government without first obtaining the consent of Congress to such an act.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think it will be obvious to every member of the Senate who will give any attention to this matter, that the sixth section of the act of 1820 wants some amendment, because while the prohibition against entering into contracts applies to some of the Secretaries, and the exception applies to some of the Secretaries, there are two heads of Departments who are not mentioned either in the license or the exception, and they are the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior, for the words of the law are:

"That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same," &c.

So the restriction is not made to apply in express terms to the Postmaster General, or to the Secretary of the Interior; but when it comes to the exceptions, they relate to certain Departments of the Army and Navy. The Postmaster General and Secretary of the Interior are left out altogether.

Now, sir, the honorable Senator from Virginia—I listened to him with a great deal of care—admitted that there was an evil. He suggested no remedy. I am perfectly satisfied that if you do not adopt this remedy, there will be none. Adopt it this year, and the evils which he imagines, will not exist in point of fact. We got along in the years 1853, 1854, and 1855 without any of these extraordinary contracts being made by the War Department. There was no deficiency asked for either of those years. The Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury have no such authority at any time, in peace or war, and my amendment, if it passes, will simply leave the other Secretaries under the same restrictions that they now are.

The honorable Senator from Virginia has a good deal to say in commendation of this provision because it is an old one, passed in 1820. Well, sir, I recollect that, a few years ago, a proposition was made to repeal a famous act, passed in 1820, for which he had not such great regard, and he was one of the swiftest to repeal it; and the fact that it was passed about that time, did not commend itself to his particular favor. Nor should it be said that the experience we have had under it demonstrates its wisdom. Sir, the experience we have had under it demonstrates its folly, and demonstrates its mischievous tendency, which is to create these very deficiency bills.

I made one statement yesterday as to which the Senator says I am mistaken in point of fact. Well, sir, if there is one single department of this Government in which I have unlimited confidence, it is the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and the clerks under him. I never found any want of accuracy or fidelity there, nor any want of disposition to accommodate those who had occasion to go to their office. Knowing their proverbial accuracy, I went to that office, and ascertained, from an examination made at the office by the clerks, that 1844 was the first year we ever had one of these bills passed. Then I turned to the debates which had taken place when it was introduced, and I saw that it was denounced on this floor as extraordinary, and unconstitutional.

Nor, sir, have I said that literally a deficiency bill is unconstitutional; but I have said, and I say now, that it is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. I said it was an observance of its letter. The letter says that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except in consequence of an appropriation made by law. We keep the letter of it, but we as palpably violate the spirit of it when we confer upon a subordinate officer the authority to pledge the faith of the Government for a debt, as we should if we authorized that officer to put his hand into the Treasury and take the money out, because it is substantially taking the money out. The public faith is pledged; the public faith must be redeemed; and the money is appropriated whenever the public faith is pledged, and after that the passage of an appropriation act is nothing but a mere form. It is just exactly like a treaty made by the President and the Senate. They pledge the public faith to the payment of certain sums, and the Congress of the United States have always felt themselves bound by honor, by their position, to meet appropriations made by that Department of the Government, and they always will. So, sir, it is virtually, not literally, a violation of the Constitution.

The honorable Senator from Maryland suggests something like a remedy, but he will pardon me if I say to him that it is no remedy at all. It is simply calling upon the President, if these extraordinary emergencies arise, when Congress meets to submit the reasons which have induced him to do it; and I am told by the honorable Senator from Maine that there is substantially a law like that now. Mr. President, we have tried this; we know what the result is. We know that now we are called upon for appropriations for deficiencies amounting to nearly ten million dollars, seven or eight millions of which are for the War Department, a sum nearly equal to the whole expenses of the Government thirty years ago, in 1828. We are called upon, in addition to the $65,000,000 appropriated last year, independent of any new appropriations under the operation of this bill, to appropriate this sum now as a deficiency. When we see the evil, when we see to what it has led, why not apply this remedy? We have seen that the Government have got along within a very late period, in 1853, 1854, and 1855, without any such license; and if they got along in 1853, 1854, and 1855, why may they not get along just as well in 1858, 1859, and 1860?

Besides, sir, these appropriations, if you will insist on giving this power, might be limited to certain contingencies which should be first ascertained to exist; but as it is now, it is an unlimited license, and a license deposited in the hands substantially of one of the subordinate officers of the Department of War, to wit, the Quartermaster General. So far as that man is concerned, all the machinery of the Constitution is virtually a nullity under the operation of the sixth section of the act of 1820, and there is no limit upon the power which he may thus exercise, and no limit upon the extent to which he may thus, in substance, expend the public treasure.

I should be glad if somebody that is in the majority—somebody that is responsible for the doings of this Administration—would suggest some remedy by which this leak is to be stopped, this evil is to be remedied, and this wrong is to be redressed. But, sir, as those gentlemen do not bring forward anything, as the Committee on Finance do not propose anything, although I am in the minority, and a small minority, in this body, I cannot divest myself of the responsibility which belongs to me as a Senator in suggesting what I believe to be necessary for the redress of those wrongs which I see perpetrated.

But, sir, it is said that Providence never sends any affliction that does not bring a blessing with it; and I rejoice and thank God that there will grow out of what gentlemen are pleased to denominate the great commercial crisis through which the country has just passed, a stern law before which even your Administration must bend, powerful as it is—and that is the law of necessity. You have not got the money to spend, and you cannot get it. We have already given the Administration power to issue twenty millions, and they will be here in a few days, asking for authority to borrow twenty or thirty millions more; and if this loose mode of appropriation continues, we must go on spending and borrowing just as long as anybody will lend to us.

I can hardly refrain from a smile when I hear a man talk about the specific appropriations which we make. I wish that somebody would look at some dictionary, and see what "specific" means, and then read some of the sections in this bill. I will read one clause, to show how specific it is:

"For incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, consisting of postage on letters and packages received and sent by officers of the Army on public service; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, including the additional compensation to judge advocates, recorders, members, and witnesses, while on that service, under the act of March 16, 1802; extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of the quartermaster's department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, storerooms, and hospitals; the construction of roads, and other constant labor, for periods of not less than ten days, under the acts of March 2, 1819, and August 4, 1854, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters; expenses of expresses to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters, other disbursing officers, and trains, when military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the internment of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the quartermaster's department, including hire of interpreters, spies, and guides, for the Army; compensation of clerk to officers of the quartermaster's department; compensation of forage and wagon masters, authorized by the act of July 5, 1838; for the apprehension of deserters, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; the following expenditures required for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, viz, the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horse and mule shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing, hire of veterinary surgeons, medicines for horses and mules, picket ropes, and shoeing the horses of those corps, $190,000.

All these things are put together under one head, and the sweeping sum of $190,000 appropriated for them; and that is called a specific appropriation. I should like to know, in the name of Heaven, if that is a specific appropriation, what a general one would be; for this puts together every imaginable item that can possibly be thought of, some of them as dissimilar as any two items can be, under one head, and appropriates $190,000, and that is called a specific appropriation. I am perfectly satisfied that if we do not apply some such remedy as this, we shall apply none. If we apply this, and it fails, or any mischief comes from it, Congress will be together in a short time, and it can be repealed. But the great difficulty in the way of my amendment is a very singular one. We have been a nation about seventy years, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and we have been engaged in a foreign war twice; and because it may be necessary to give this extraordinary discretion to the Secretary of War in time of war, we are going to make it a general provision, governing all time, both in war and in peace. As was well said on another occasion, what was intended as an extreme medicine to a sick patient we propose to administer as his daily food, and let the Government have the exercise of a discretion every day in time of peace, which it is admitted there is no possible excuse for except in time of war.

I will not trouble the Senate any longer, but merely close what I have to say by asking, that when the question be taken on my amendment, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggested to the honorable Senator from Maryland, that there was already a provision of law somewhere which I had seen, as I thought broad enough to cover the suggestion made by him. I will call his attention to it. It is a provision in the act of April 21, 1803:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, annually to lay before Congress a statement of all the contracts which have been made in their respective Departments during the year preceding such report, exhibiting in such statement the names of the contractor, the article or thing contracted for, the place where the article was to be delivered, or the thing performed, the sum to be paid for its performance on delivery, the date and duration of the contract."

Mr. PEARCE. I was very well aware that there was such a law as that, requiring all contracts to be reported to Congress; and mixed up with the general mass of all contracts, our attention is not likely to be drawn to these special contracts, made under authority of the act of May, 1820. I thought, therefore, we should have the matter brought more immediately to our observation, and have a more direct responsibility enforced, if there were special provisions requiring a special report of contracts made in virtue of that authority, to be submitted to us at the next session of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know whether the provisions of this fifth section of the act of 1808 have been followed or not. I am not aware of any such document annually communicated to Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. It is communicated annually I think. For the last two or three years it has not been printed, but it is annually communicated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know there has been a very great call during the present session of Congress for contracts made by the War Department, and it has been somewhat difficult to obtain them; but if this provision of law had been complied with, those contracts certainly would have been laid before us—all that were made in the recess of Congress at the commencement of the Congress; and we should have had them before us.

Mr. PEARCE. You could not discriminate, if they were.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We might very easily discriminate, by looking over the report. If you appended a provision of this description to every appropriation bill, it might make the duty more specific, and call it to the attention of the officers. I am very much inclined to think that the duty under this law has been wholly neglected.

Mr. President, so much has been said in relation to contracts made by the War Department, that I have had occasion to inquire a little where the authority originated, and how it has been exercised; and I have come to the conclusion, from my examination, coupled with what gentlemen have said as to the practice, that it must have been before the act of 1820 a common practice under the laws organizing the Departments for the heads of the different Departments to make contracts in advance of appropriations whenever necessity required it. The law, in the different acts organizing the Departments, specifically gives to the heads of those Departments the power to make contracts. It does not say expressly whether they shall make the contracts when they have the money to found them upon, or in pursuance of specific objects prescribed; but says simply, in general terms, that they may make contracts with reference to the affairs of their Departments. I presume, therefore, as that power had existed ever since the formation of the Departments, that up to the year 1820 there had been a somewhat indiscriminate exercise of the power, and that the effect of the law of 1820, and the intention of that law, were to limit that power; and it had an effect to limit that power in all except these specified instances, because the provision there is precisely the same in its terms with the language of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, which, I suppose, he took from the provision of the law of 1820; and then follows the exception which he now attempts to strike off. For reasons which were satisfactory to the Congress at that time, I suppose, Congress came to the conclusion to take away the power from the heads of Departments to make contracts except in the specified exceptional instances named in the law of 1820, referring to the quartermaster's department and certain other matters connected with the War and Navy Departments.

A few days ago the Senate, on my suggestion, called upon the Secretary of War for an enumeration of the contracts made by him during this session without previous notice being given. In reply to that, we find a report in which he tells us that since Congress has been in session there have been some six or eight very important contracts for transportation, and for the purchase of horses and stores, and for one thing and another for the Army, made without previous notice, without calling for bids or anything of that description. It may not be known generally—I have not seen it adverted to anywhere, but the truth of the matter is—that that power to make contracts without previous notice in that way, has been exercised entirely against law, and exercised under the alleged authority of this provision of the act of 1820, which does not give it. The act reorganizing several of the Departments in 1809—the year succeeding the passage of the act from which I before read—contains this provision:

"Sec. 5. That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services which are or may according to law be made, by or under the direction of either the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, shall be made either by open purchase or by previously advertising for proposals respecting the same."

Then it goes on:

"And an annual statement of all such contracts and purchase, and also of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the military establishment, for the contingent expenses of the Navy of the United States, and for the discharge of miscellaneous claims not otherwise provided for and paid out of the Treasury, shall be laid before Congress at the beginning of each year by the Secretary of the proper Department."

There is a specific provision that in all cases, except where the Department goes into the market and buys with money, all contracts made by the Departments must be on previous notice given. Well, sir, the provision of the law of 1820 does not change that at all, as will be observed on reading it. It reads as follows:

"Sec. 6. That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting, also, contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Navy or Army, and contracts by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

You will observe, sir, that although the last clause of that section allows the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, in certain excepted cases, to make contracts without an appropriation, yet the law of 1809 still remains in existence, and that law provides that if they make them, they must make them after previous notice. Well, now, sir, the Secretary of War, in half a dozen instances since this Congress has been in session, as proved by the papers on your table, has assumed to make contracts for provisions of clothing, for transportation, for horses, and for different things, which are enumerated in his communication, without any previous notice whatever. He has taken the exercise of that authority upon himself. When this exception was made, in the act of 1820, and Congress undertook to say that no contract should be made except in pursuance of appropriation, unless in certain specified cases, the idea was that those specified cases should be protected by the positive law of 1809, which provided that notice should be given and fair bids received. But the Secretary of War, in repeated instances, even since this session of Congress commenced, has, according to his own showing, made contracts to enormous amounts, without any sort of previous notice to anybody, and without affording any chance for competition. I presume there can be no dispute about that.

That is the state of the case with regard to the contracts. I have stated this because it seems to be connected with the proposition made by the Senator from New Hampshire to take away entirely this power of making contracts. Whether it is expedient to remove it entirely or not, I am not exactly convinced. I think there is very much in the suggestions that have been made by the chairman of the Finance Committee on this subject, that with our very extended territory and in the situation in which we now find ourselves frequently during the recess of Congress, probably there may be cases where it is impossible to wait for an appropriation when new emergencies arise.

Senators, however, have suggested that that should be confined to a case of war. Well, now, the trouble is, as suggested by the chairman of the Finance Committee, that we are always liable to sudden wars—not with foreign Powers, but we are eternally liable to difficulties with Indians, difficulties upon the frontiers. All appears to be very fair and smooth to-day, and to-morrow, by somebody's fault, whether the fault of the Indians or the fault of the whites, we are plunged into difficulties with the Indians, and compelled to remove troops and to purchase supplies, to acquire what we had not before. The question then arises as has been stated, whether Congress shall be called together to meet that emergency, taking all the time that it does to call Congress together and legislate, or whether the power to purchase the necessary articles for the time, those that are absolutely essential at the moment, shall be lodged where it is now, in the quartermaster's department, but at the same time requiring, in order to protect it and see that everything is fairly done, that it shall be done in such a way as not to give power to the Department to exercise favoritism, or to put money into the hands of people more than ought to be placed there for the purpose which is sought to be accomplished.

However that may be, there is certainly one thing which might be done. It is very certain, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, that when Congress is in session there is not the slightest excuse for the Secretary making these heavy contracts without consulting Congress. Instead of undertaking to make contracts in advance of appropriations, and contracts to the amount of millions when he can come to those who are, by the Constitution, entitled to exercise the power of appropriating money for specific purposes, for the support of the Army, it is his duty to come there, and the duty of the President to come there, and not assume (under an exception in the law which is intended to meet an emergency when Congress is not in session) to make these enormous contracts, and thus to carry out objects that he may choose to think ought to be accomplished, without consulting Congress, who are not only the power to appropriate money but the war-making power in addition. Yet, sir, in this particular instance this is what the Administration has done, there is no question about it. Not only has it assumed to make contracts contrary to the express provisions of the law upon that subject, and contracts to enormous amounts; but it has assumed to make those contracts at the very time Congress was in session here at the Capitol, when all the Administration had to do was to go to that branch of the Government invested by the Constitution with the power to appropriate money, and with the power to declare war.

No one can hesitate to say that here is an enormous abuse and an enormous assumption. It is on the part of the executive Government taking into its own hands two of the most important, most necessary, most essential safeguards thrown around our system of government. One is, that the money of the Government shall not be used except by the consent of Congress; and this safeguard is got rid of by the Executive making the appropriations, not directly, but indirectly, as the Senator from New Hampshire states. Next, they appropriate money thus obtained, to be expended by contracts for the materials which they wish to procure by money, in order to carry out a purpose which Congress, being in session, might not approve, and upon which they should be called upon to decide and judge.

It was with reference to that particular view of the subject that I called for this information; and the response to the call will show any Senator, on the very face of the paper that is printed and laid on our tables this morning, an admission by the Secretary of War that that has been done in numerous instances, and to large amounts. We did not call for a still more important contract, which I should like to see; but I believe it is mentioned in a document in the possession of the chairman of the Finance Committee; and that is the contract for transportation, which I think is the largest and most important of all. I believe that contract was also entered into without notice, with Majors & Russell. It is referred to in the document giving a list of contracts, which I believe came from the other House. That contract covers the enormous transportation of materials to Utah—I think for twenty months ahead, giving the prices. I do not know whether those prices are too high or too low, or anything about it; but the aggregate amount is enormous; and you find this proved by the amount called for in this bill to be appropriated, between five and six million dollars, for the transportation of the Army and of supplies alone; and yet that contract, unless I am very much mistaken—and if I am mistaken the document will show it—has been entered into since this Congress has been in session, for the transportation of troops and supplies to Utah, without any previous notice whatever, and without calling on Congress in any way to notice the fact.

Now, sir, I impute no wrong intention to the Secretary of War or to these people—that is to say, nothing in the detail. They are wrong in the very start, in my judgment, in reference to this expedition to Utah; but in the detail, I presume, because I take the most charitable construction, that they really did not know what the law was. The truth is, that our officials have been in the habit so long of going on just as they pleased in reference to money matters that they do not now much trouble themselves to inquire what the law is. I say, sir, that my attention has been called to this matter in reference to some amendment necessary to be made, and I have drafted one. I am not certain that it is perfect by any means; but I will send it to the Clerk's desk in order that it may be read, that the Senate may see how far I propose to go.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for, or applied to, the service of any other year, nor be transferred to, or used for, any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated; and no contract for Army supplies, or service of any description, shall be hereafter made during the session of Congress, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; nor shall any such be made hereafter, at any time, without previous public advertisement for proposals respecting the same.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is substantially re-enacting one or two provisions already in the law, but which have been inserted in appropriation bills heretofore, and might possibly be considered as not operative at the present time. The provision restricting the Secretaries from making any contract whatever during the session of Congress, in advance of supplies, is new. I drew it yesterday; and I am very glad that my friend from Rhode Island seems to entertain the same opinion I do upon that subject. It was as far (with the reflection I had been able to give to the subject of restricting this power to make contracts, considering the great extent of our country, and the duties the Army has to perform, and the contingencies that may arise) as I had deemed it safe to go. Perhaps I am in error; certainly I have no particular attachment to the provision that would induce me to stand to that, in the place of a better one.

The first provision of the amendment I have suggested, preventing the application of money which is voted for one year to the service of another, I believe to be exceedingly necessary. Now it is sometimes the case that the Government undertakes, when it finds a balance in its hands, to misappropriate it—to appropriate it contrary to the directions of Congress. We have had a striking instance of this shown in a document which I have before me, and in a communication made to the other House which I saw in the newspapers. The last Congress expressly refused to appropriate money for the service of a particular year in the Territory of Kansas, to pay the Territorial Legislature. We find, however, by the returns of the expenditures, that $10,000 or $15,000 has been paid for that purpose. The question arose, where was the money obtained? and in response to a call upon him, the Secretary of the Treasury states, without a word of apology or explanation, that the money had been taken from a previous appropriation, an appropriation for a preceding year, which was on hand, and thus persons were paid whom Congress had expressly refused to pay. I give that as an illustration. Congress might have been wrong and unreasonable in that particular instance; but if the Secretary of the Treasury can use his own discretion in one case, he may use it in another. If he may undertake to say that Congress is wrong in a particular instance, and that he will appropriate money for paying what they say ought not to be paid and what they refuse to pay, from funds in his hands, it is a power that becomes exceedingly dangerous in its use and exercise. He may do it at any time, and any unused balances that he may find on hand he may appropriate at his discretion. There is a similar provision which was drafted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in one of the appropriation bills, and I believe it was really in existence at the time this appropriation was made.

Now, Mr. President, there are several objections to this bill, and I may as well, perhaps, state at this time what I propose in regard to it. The great objection to the bill is really that it seeks to accomplish, by indirection, a purpose which has never been authorized by Congress, and which was undertaken by the Administration, in my judgment, without any proper authority. I have made an effort to analyze the bill, and it is almost impossible to make any analysis of it, and to find what properly belongs to one year and what properly belongs to another; what should properly be appropriated and what should not be appropriated; but yet I have succeeded partially, so far at any rate as to be able to draft an amendment which will express the idea I entertain about it. I send that amendment to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, which is to strike out all the appropriations contained in the bill between line thirty on page 2 and line one hundred and eighteen on page 6, being the appropriations for the Army, and to insert:

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, in the year ending June 30, 1857, $279,377 57.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, in the year ending June 30, 1857, $129,660 20.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1857, $751,487 15.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for barracks and quarters in the year ending June 30, 1857, $67,954 30.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $300,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $60,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1858, $500,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for constructing barracks and other expenses incident to the same, and to quarters for the troops, and to storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores during the year ending June 30, 1858, $50,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the purchase of horses necessary to be purchased in the year ending June 30, 1858, for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts, $100,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for subsistence in kind necessary to be procured in the year ending June 30, 1858, — dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. HUNTER. Allow me to suggest that it has been stated to me the Senator from Maine is willing that the vote shall be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, and then it will be in order for him to offer his amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That suggestion was made to me and I said it was of no sort of consequence to me whether I went on now or allowed the vote to be taken on the amendment of my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. STUART. I made the suggestion. It seems to me that it would be better to take the sense of the Senate at this time on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and therefore, I suggested to the Senator from Maine that if it made no difference to the course of his remarks, (and I understood from him that it did not,) it would be better to allow that to be acted upon. I hope the Senate will vote on that question now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON in the chair.) The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. GREEN. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire will be voted down. I do not think we ought to introduce anything that would have a tendency to embarrass the public administration of the Army and Navy, and I really think it would have that tendency. Now, I have seen nothing in the conduct of the Secretaries at the head of these Departments to justify any suspicion of their honesty or their integrity; and I believe there must be, there ought to be, a discretionary power left somewhere to supply the wants of the Army and the Navy. As was well explained by the Senator from Maryland, this provision of law was made in 1820, under the advice of President Monroe, who, having been Secretary of War and Secretary of State, and having had much to do with the administration of public affairs, saw the necessity of something like it. Even if Congress were in session, we could not always get the bills through to meet the wants of the Army and Navy, and it might drive the Secretaries either to disband the Army or lay the Navy up in ordinary. I believe this power to be a necessary means of keeping up the efficiency of the public service, and therefore I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. HALE. In accordance with the suggestion of some friends around me, I will modify my amendment, though I shall not like it so well myself after it is modified. I propose, after the word "fulfillment," to insert:

Except in time of war with a foreign nation.

So as to make it read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by any officer or agent of the Government, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in time of war with a foreign nation; and the sixth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved May 1, 1820, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I say "war with a foreign nation" so as to exclude these so-called Indian wars.

Mr. POLK. Does the Senator provide for cases of insurrection and rebellion?

Mr. HALE. I do not believe we shall ever have any.

Mr. POLK. I only want to know whether the Senator has provided for them.

Mr. HALE. I have made no provision for them.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doollittle, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Simons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigger, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now propose this amendment as an additional section, and ask for the yeas and nays upon it:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year, shall be used for or applied to the service of any other year, nor be transferred to or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated; and no contract for Army supplies or service of any description shall be hereafter made during the session of Congress, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; nor shall any such contract be made hereafter, at any time, without previous public advertisement for proposals respecting the same.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to amend the amendment, by adding to it:

To be given at least sixty days before making the contract, in three newspapers printed in the city of Washington.

Mr. HUNTER. If I understand this amendment of the Senator from Maine, it proposes that no part of the money appropriated in this bill shall be used in any other fiscal year than this.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It says that no part of the money appropriated in this bill for any one fiscal year, shall be used in another fiscal year.

Mr. HUNTER. That is imposing a limitation upon the use of appropriations, which is certainly contrary to the usage and the experience of this Government from, I believe, 1795 up to this time. It is a matter of law that appropriations, when once made, shall be subject to the uses of the Government for two years. They endure for that period of time, according to the law and usage of the Government. After that they go to the surplus fund, and can no longer be used by a Department.

Now, sir, there is a manifest reason for this. You make an appropriation for one fiscal year, and it may be that the expenditures within that fiscal year are not known and not audited until the next year, and especially is this the case in a country so large as ours. According to this amendment, however, although the expenditures were made in the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made, yet, inasmuch as they were not known and not audited, the accounts not coming in until afterwards, the money thus appropriated could not be applied to these expenditures. That is not all. There would be a great inconvenience to the Departments if they could not use an appropriation during the period of two years. The surplus for one year may be transferred over to the other, and a report is made to Congress, showing the amount of these surplus appropriations. They know where they are; they know the amount of them; they know to what purposes they are applicable; and the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury are founded upon the existence of these surpluses. Where he has a balance of appropriation remaining over from the preceding year, he applies it to the next, and so on, until it becomes more than two years old, and he only asks for enough, in addition, to enable him to carry out the service of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to show him how he has mistaken the provision?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My amendment is "that no part of the amount appropriated by this act, for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for, or applied to, the service of any other year;" not that it shall not be paid in the next year, for bills accruing or audited. The authority to pay lasts so long as the debt lasts. The money may be applied for the service of that year so long as it lasts. It does not come in conflict with the law of which the Senator speaks, at all. It only provides that money shall not, without a new appropriation, without the consent of Congress, be taken from the service of the year for which it was appropriated and applied to the service of another year.

Mr. HUNTER. That is a provision to repeal the act in relation to the surplus fund, passed in 1795, which has expressly provided that appropriations, when once made, shall be subject to the uses of the Department for two years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; but it is for the purposes for which they were appropriated.

Mr. HUNTER. This act has been justified by experience, and this, as far as I know, is the first attempt to amend it. What possible objection can there be to allowing an appropriation, when once made, to be used for two years? After that it goes to the surplus fund, and cannot be used at all. By doing this you enable the Secretaries to get along with a less amount of annual appropriation; because, if unexpected accounts should be brought in, matters which had not been audited before in the preceding year, they could be paid out of any balance that remained of an existing appropriation; and here is a fund upon which they might rely. If, on the contrary, you make the appropriation last but one year, you require them to come in every year with estimates for new appropriations, and require reappropriations of these balances; you expose them to these inconveniences in relation to amounts which may not come in from the expenditures of the year before.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to interrupt him for the purpose of drawing his attention to what I understand to be the effect of the amendment, if I do understand it; and I should like to hear the Senator's objections to it, if there are any. I understand that the design of this amendment is to prevent transfers by using money appropriated for one purpose for another distinct purpose. In order to effect that object, the Senator from Maine has introduced this language in regard to appropriations for the service of a particular year. It is all to carry out the object of preventing the use of money appropriated for one purpose for another and a distinct purpose—not to limit it at all, for, as the Senator from Maine has remarked, the appropriation would continue as long as the debt continued, no matter how many years. Until the account came in and was audited, the appropriation made to pay it would stand and would not be limited even to the two years; but the object is to prevent the use of money appropriated for one purpose for any other purpose whatever.

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir; the Senator from Maine desires, by his amendment, to accomplish two objects: one is to confine the use of appropriations to one year, and to repeal this provision in regard to the surplus fund which allows them to be used for two years, and the other is to limit the right of transfers. He has two objects in view, if I understand his amendment, if I do not, he will say so.

Mr. STUART. I hope he will.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment speaks for itself. The Senator from Virginia was commenting on the first provision, and I will explain it. The provision of law in regard to the surplus is a very plain one. You will find it in the tenth section of an act passed in 1852: "when any moneys shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriations by law," other than certain exceptions therein named, "for more than two years after the expiration of the fiscal year in which the act shall have been passed, all and any such appropriations shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined; and the moneys so unexpended shall be immediately thereafter carried, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the account of the surplus fund." That is to say, when money is appropriated to any particular object, except in certain specified cases, and remains unexpended for more than two years after the expiration of the fiscal year, it shall not be appropriated to that object then, but shall go to the surplus fund. That is the provision specifically. The amendment which I have attempted to introduce here does not conflict with that at all, nor attempt to change it. It says simply, "that no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of one fiscal year," not shall be used for that year, but "shall be used for, or applied to, the service of any other year." That is a very different thing, as the Senate will perceive. I do not attempt in this amendment to interfere with the provisions in regard to the surplus fund—they stand—but I do attempt to provide that where you appropriate money for a particular object, in a particular year, it shall not be used for the service of any other year. That is all.

Mr. HUNTER. The provision in relation to the surplus fund, which was passed in 1795—the policy has been established ever since then—allows the Departments to use an appropriation for two years, and after that it goes to the surplus fund. No matter when the expenditures were made upon which the accounts are rendered afterwards, it requires a reappropriation after two years. But there were certain permanent appropriations, and there were certain constructions of laws in regard to permanent appropriations, under which it was supposed the Departments had got around the act in relation to the surplus fund, and really used the appropriations for a longer period than two years. I recollect the provision alluded to by the Senator from Maine, for it was introduced on my motion to meet that very evil; but I never dreamed of limiting the power to use appropriations to only one year, or altering the established policy of the Government which allowed them to use appropriations for two years, and then absolutely required the balance to go to the surplus fund. I have always believed that that was a wise policy, and if I recollect aright, the Constitution of the United States specially limits appropriations, so far as the War Department is concerned, to the service of two years. They may be used for two years and no longer.

Now let us take the amendment which the Senator from Maine proposes. An appropriation is made for the next fiscal year, that is, after the 1st of July. Accounts come in for expenditures in May and June. No part of that appropriation can be applied to them. Would not this expose the Department to great inconvenience? It has been the habit heretofore to pay such accounts and such expenditures out of the existing appropriation which can be used until it is more than two years old.

But, sir, it is enough to say that it is changing the established policy of this Government—one which experience seems to have sanctioned for so long a period as that to which I have referred; and I can see no good reason for it. I see no increase of responsibility to be gained by it. I believe the sole effect of it would be to create a necessity for deficiency bills, and to force the Departments to come here and ask for additional appropriations, when they might avoid that necessity by recurring to existing balances of old appropriations which are subject to their use. That would be the whole effect of it. It would multiply the inducements to deficiency bills, and create additional embarrassment and confusion in managing the affairs of the Departments.

Nor is this the time, it seems to me, upon an appropriation bill, to alter the whole machinery of the Government and its established usage, upon so little notice as this. Would it not be better for the Senator from Maine to originate some system, if he does not like the old one, present it in a separate shape, and give us time to consider it? For one, sir, I believe that, so far as the provision in regard to the duration for two years of the appropriations is concerned, it will be found that there is no good reason for changing it. You will not increase the responsibility of the Departments by doing so; you will not promote economy; and you will certainly expose them to additional inconveniences.

But the Senator proposes to limit the power of transfer still further than it is now limited by the existing law. It is already limited very much in the War Department by the act of August 31, 1852. Let me read the provision of that act:

"That all acts or parts of acts authorizing the President of the United States, or the Secretary of the proper Department under his direction, to transfer any portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department to be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department, be, and are hereby, so far as relates to the Department of War, repealed; and no portion of the moneys appropriated by this act shall be applied to the payment of any expenses incurred prior to the 1st day of July, 1852."

The experiment was tried one year, as I remember, and did not work very well.

"But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the President from authorizing appropriations for the subsistence of the Army, for forage, for the medical and hospital department, and for the quartermaster's department, to be applied to any other of the above-mentioned branches of expenditure in the same department; and appropriations made for a specific object for one fiscal year, shall not be transferred to any other object after the expiration of that year."

So that by existing laws the power of transfer is limited to these objects: appropriations for subsistence, for forage, for the medical and hospital department, and for the quartermaster's department, may be transferred, and none others. Now is it not proper that the right of transfer should exist in relation to these? What would be the effect of repealing this right of transfer? The only effect would be, as I said before, that we should have to make larger appropriations under each particular head, so as to be sure that they had enough, and something to spare. You would only increase the sum total of the appropriations. It promotes economy to allow them to transfer within this limited range.

The amendment of the Senator from Maine contains another limitation as I understand, and that is, to provide that in all cases where contracts are made there shall be proposals published beforehand; and for the purpose of showing the propriety of making this provision, the Senator from Maine refers to the report of the contracts made by the Secretary of War. In regard to the law, I believe it has been the practice of the Department and the construction of the act of 1820, which allows them to make contracts ahead of the appropriation, that it allows them to do it without notice. I believe that certainly has been the practice. It was the construction because the same necessity which required them to have this power to contract ahead of the appropriations, would often require them to contract at once, without notice. Here is one of the very first contracts contained in this document, a contract in regard to the transportation of the troops from St. Louis to Leavenworth. They could not wait to give sixty days' notice for that. What is to be done in such a case as that? Advertise for sixty days before you should move the troops? You are obliged to leave some discretion in the head of the Department in relation to this matter of transportation and subsistence. As to the other contract reported to have been made without notice and without any bid, I think it will be found to be a very good contract when it is examined. I understand there was actually an advertisement, and the lowest bid was fourteen cents. The Secretary refused to accept that, and made this very contract on much better and cheaper terms.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He says there was no notice given.

Mr. HUNTER. He says so because this contract was not given in pursuance of any bid put in under that notice; but I understand the fact to be that there was a notice, but the bids put in under the notice were so high that they were refused and a contract was made with these persons on much more advantageous terms afterwards. I should be willing to accede to any amendment, if the Senator can designate one, which will require contracts to be made upon advertisement if he can except such cases as these I have mentioned; but it is obvious that it would not do to require the War Department to advertise a contract for transportation when there is a sudden emergency.

If the Senator can discriminate, I would agree to any amendment which would require advertisement in most of the cases. I think they ought to be made. I think that is a safe restriction; but I do not see just now, if we are to tie him up, how we could meet such emergencies as those I have just spoken of. In our western rivers the waters are up to-day and down to-morrow. There might be a fall of waters; a thousand things might occur which might render it exceedingly inconvenient for him to wait until he had given sixty days' notice before making a contract for transportation.

There is another provision in the amendment, that when Congress is in session these contracts must be made upon notice. That the law does not require it, I suppose is evident. That the law of 1890 allows the Secretary to make these contracts whether Congress is in session or not, in advance of the appropriation, I suppose nobody can dispute. Whether it ought to be changed or not, is another question. But I will put this case to the Senator from Maine: in the event that we do change it, what is to become of the contracts made at a distance—made on the Pacific coast, for example, while Congress is in session—made under general authority, of which we could have no notice until after they were made? Are all contracts for transportation or subsistence to be kept back until Congress acts? Is the Secretary to come here for every contract that he makes ahead of the appropriations while Congress is in session, to ask the authority for doing it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In answer to the Senator, if he requires an answer here, I will say that that is a perfectly clear case, and very easily answered. The Secretary of War makes these contracts. The power is given to him, not to his subordinates. He is in Washington. He is the man to make the contracts. If he wants to make a contract, and Congress is in session, he can have the authority from Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator from Maine suppose that the Secretary of War makes contracts for the transportation of troops from San Francisco to Oregon?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. Surely they are made through his agent. Does he suppose that the Secretary of War made the contract for the transportation of the troops from St. Louis to Leavenworth?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If he does not make them, if they are made by his agents, my answer would be that he has no authority to give his agents power to make contracts, except in pursuance of appropriations in such cases; and he ought not to have it. The Senator concedes that, for everything except a sudden emergency, the power of making contracts without the authority of law should not exist. Therefore, he cannot give instructions in advance to his agents at that distance, because the emergencies are not upon them. The only authority he could give would be for the ordinary service, and for the ordinary service the appropriations are already made; and within those appropriations he can make contracts, because they come within the authority of law. But the case that I want to provide for is an exception. It is the case of sudden emergencies arising, which require contracts outside of and beyond the appropriations, to be made at once; and, with regard to those, nobody can exercise that power but the Secretary of War himself, and nobody would suppose that it should be committed to an agent, under any circumstances.

Mr. HUNTER. I put the case of this very contract for the transportation of the troops from St. Louis to Leavenworth. Was the Secretary of War to keep the troops in St. Louis until he could send for the agents of the Pacific Railroad Company, as they are called, to come on here and make a contract, or was he to authorize his agents to do it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. He must have authorized the contracts.

Mr. HUNTER. How else could he have authorized the contracts except by authorizing an agent to make them? How could he administer his Department without giving a general authority to his agents at a distance? Can he supervise things on the Pacific coast?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer is, that that is a very poor illustration; for I deny that there was any necessity at all; I deny the emergency.

Mr. HUNTER. Suppose an Indian war was to break out, and the general commanding makes an order to transfer the troops: would not there be an emergency?

Mr. FESSENDEN. You may suppose a thousand things.

Mr. HUNTER. Take this very case, where it is necessary to carry supplies to the troops in Utah, when the Government is moving large bodies of men and large trains. Is it to be supposed that the Secretary of War can himself personally inspect every contract, or that he can give specific directions for them ahead? All he can do is to intrust his agents with the general authority to perform a certain service. He may give some instructions as to the best means of performing it, but he is bound to repose discretion in them. He cannot make the contracts personally himself.

I see no way of avoiding that evil. If the Senator can suggest any discrimination between certain sorts of contracts that are to be advertised, and others where it would be impossible to do so, I would go with him; but, until I see it, I am not willing to vote for anything couched in terms so general as this amendment.

In short, sir, I think as to the propositions of this amendment: first, to diminish the time during which an appropriation can be used from two years to one; second, to limit the power of transfer further than it is already limited by the law which I have read; and third, to provide that the Secretary of War, in fact, shall enter into no contracts for transportation or subsistence while Congress is in session, unless they are all transmitted here; it seems to me that the first would be unwise, and the last impracticable. If it could be made practicable, I should be very willing to vote for the last. If the Senator can show me how it can be made practicable, I shall not object to it; but, as it now stands, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Virginia has seemed to find very great difficulty in understanding what I mean. Although I may try to accomplish something that he thinks is difficult, if not impossible to be accomplished, yet I really hope that he will contrive to understand what I design to do, what I wish to accomplish. Now, sir, let me take the whole of this amendment and explain it as I understand it, and see if there is any such very severe difficulty about it as the Senator supposes. Let us see if his objections apply. The first clause I have already read twice, and I repeat that it does not by any sort of possibility interfere with the payment in one year of accruing bills that were incurred in the preceding year. The Senator seems to suppose that by this provision money must be absolutely paid over for the service of a year during the year when the service was rendered.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me ask the Senator a question. He makes an appropriation for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st of July, and the expenditure is made in June, in this fiscal year. According to his provision, the Departments cannot make provision for that expenditure made in June out of the appropriations for the next fiscal year to commence in July.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. HUNTER. He confines the appropriations to the service of the year for which the money is appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUNTER. I put the case of an expenditure made in this year, say in June; and the appropriation is for the fiscal year commencing the 1st of next July. You cannot pay this expenditure in June out of the appropriation for this fiscal year, because it does not come in in time, and you cannot pay it out of the next, because it is not for the service of that year for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken. You can pay it in the next year. If the service was rendered in this, and not paid, it can be paid in the next. What is the trouble?

Mr. HUNTER. You can pay it in the next, if there is a balance of appropriation; but suppose there is no balance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment I have offered presupposes a balance of appropriation in such cases, of course. If there is not money on hand, it cannot be paid.

Mr. HUNTER. There may be money on hand, and that money may not be appropriated. Certainly there are many cases where there is no balance of appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand the Senator, and I really do not see what his difficulty is. I can see no difficulty whatever. If an indebtedness accrues for a service rendered during this year, and money has been appropriated to pay it, why cannot that money be paid after the year has expired? This provision does not prevent it in any possible way.

Mr. HUNTER. It prevents it if there is no balance of appropriation for this fiscal year. For instance, if, in the quartermaster's department, there was no balance, it cannot be paid out of the appropriations for the quartermaster's department for the next fiscal year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is very true, and that is precisely what I wish to prevent. My object is to keep every appropriation confined to the matter for which it was appropriated. For instance, we appropriate a certain sum of money, a million if you please, to accomplish a specified object this year, no matter what that object is. Expenses accrue. These bills may not come in and be audited until sometime next year. When they are audited, the balance on hand in the Treasury can be applied to paying those bills; but, if that appropriation is exhausted, what I mean to say is, that you shall not take the appropriations of the succeeding year made for another purpose, to pay that balance which is due for the service of the last year. That is giving a discretion to the officers of the Treasury, which, I think, has been abused. There is no difficulty about this provision of my amendment. It does not interfere, as the Senator supposes, in the slightest degree with any provision of law in regard to the surplus fund. It says simply, "confine your payments to the fund which we have appropriated to make the payments with, and do not take the money which we have appropriated to other objects to pay them." The succeeding clause which I have inserted, that so far as this act is concerned—for it is confined to this act—you shall not transfer a matter which is appropriated to one head of expenditure to another, is of precisely the same character. It is to carry out the same object.

Mr. HUNTER. Now, will the Senator allow me here to ask him a question? He says it does not interfere with the provision as to the surplus fund. Why, sir, according to the surplus fund law, an appropriation made for the next fiscal year, if there be a balance, may be applied to services performed in the succeeding fiscal year; but, according to his amendment, it cannot be applied to it; it must be confined to the service of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. It is true, it can be paid for services for a preceding year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator and I do not understand it in the same way; and I think I am right. He does not convince me, at any rate. Here is a certain object for which you appropriate money—half a million, if you please—and the law provides that, if you do not expend that money for that object within two years after the expiration of the fiscal year in which it is appropriated, you shall not expend it at all, but it shall go to the surplus fund. It does not provide that you may expend that half million dollars for any other object within those two years. The Senator's argument supposes that, so long as the two years exist, and until that time has expired, you may take that half million dollars, and, if you do not spend it on a matter for which it is appropriated, you may spend it for anything. That is what I want to prevent. I say this amendment does not interfere with the surplus fund law, because that law only says you shall not expend it for the purpose for which it was appropriated two years ago, after the year for which it was appropriated has expired. Therefore my amendment, in this respect, goes no further than to say that, when you have appropriated money for specific purposes for one particular year, you shall not take that money and apply it for the purposes of another year, or for an object for which it was not appropriated. You may keep it on for two years, and expend it for that purpose, until the money is all gone and the purpose accomplished.

Mr. HUNTER. As the law now stands, you cannot transfer an appropriation in the War Department for more than one year, or to an object different from that for which it was made. But the point to which I call the attention of the Senator from Maine is this: that, under the existing law, an appropriation—say for the quartermaster's department—is applicable to claims upon that department until it is more than two years old. There is a great convenience in that, and I do not see any harm that can arise from it. The Senator, on the other hand, proposes to say it shall be applied to nothing but to the service and the particular object to which it was appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a matter of detail, and that I grant; that is to say, so long as the right of transfer exists, you may go on for two years expending the money in that department. That is precisely what ought not to be done, in my judgment, and precisely what I want to prevent. The Senator says here is an inconvenience; that you have more money appropriated for one particular branch of expenditure than you have for another, and you may transfer, therefore, the balances one way or another to suit yourself; and not only that, but from one year to another.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator does not wish to be in error?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not believe I am.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is the law:

"Appropriations made for a specific object in one fiscal year shall not be transferred to another object after the expiration of that year."

The power to transfer does not exist after the year is over now, under the existing law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I read that when I drew this amendment; and I wanted to make the provision specific here, and not only make it specific, but go a little further, and say that it shall not be changed from one head to another within the year. What is the fact in reference to this matter? In the first place, we make departments, offices, and bureaus for every kind of subdivision almost that can be made of the duties of a Department, and we require estimates from them. Why should not they be exact enough in making their estimates to enable us to accomplish the purpose? I do not wish to change the responsibility from one to another, and I do not want to give the Department power to get appropriations under one head which may be more than are necessary, and thus get the power of expending the money under another head to which we should not be willing they should apply the money. That is the trouble, and that is the difficulty I want to meet.

All that the Senator from Virginia objects to that, and the only ground of his objection to the remaining clause of this amendment is, that some inconveniences may arise. It is possible that in some cases they may; but the question is, is not the object an important one? I have specified one particular instance in which money has been appropriated, as the Senator will now admit, contrary to law—I allude to the cases of the money that was taken from the appropriation of one year for the Legislature of Kansas, and appropriated to another object, and that was to pay another Legislature in another year, directly in the teeth of the provision of the law which he has now read. That was done by the present Secretary of the Treasury. We have this present Secretary of the Treasury disregarding the law in reference to the transfer of appropriations, and the Secretary of War disregarding the law in regard to making contracts without notice.

Mr. HUNTER. That is not a transfer of appropriation. It was an appropriation for the expenses of the Legislature. It is not a transfer. That was a continuing and existing subject of appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is true; but it is not the same appropriation. An appropriation is made to pay the Legislature of one year, and no appropriation is made to pay the Legislature of another year? Are not these different things? Does the Senator say that that is precisely the same purpose, the same object? It is of the same nature, the same character; but it is not the same thing.

Mr. HUNTER. We make appropriations for the expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and if there is a balance over, we expend it in the next fiscal year. Surely we do. It has been considered a subsisting, continuing appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That cannot be.

Mr. HUNTER. It is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a very different object, and so understood. The Senator perfectly well knows that Congress refused an appropriation for one of those years. Did Congress understand it to be the same thing? Certainly not; and it is not the same thing. The two are of the same nature, the same character; but different in point of fact, and therefore I say there was an utter disregard and violation of the law in reference to this particular matter.

However, that does not belong to this bill. I was explaining the amendment I have proposed. I grant that there may be some trifling inconvenience; but the question is, in putting money into the hands of officers of the Departments to expend, are we to consider only the inconveniences they may be subjected to, if those inconveniences are trifling in their nature, and not likely to arise? Is it to be supposed that our Departments and bureaus cannot come within gun-shot of a correct estimate of the money they want for a particular purpose, and that therefore we must leave this power in their hands? It should rather be supposed they would make their estimates correctly.

There is another point that I deem to be of very great importance; and I am perfectly willing, when I come to speak on this bill at large, to explain at length the reason why. In regard to this matter of contracts, the Senator says it is impossible to give notice. Sir, does not the law require notice? Does the Senator contend that the provision of the law of 1820 repeals the provision of the law of 1809?

Mr. HUNTER. I say that seems to have been the construction of one of our Departments ever since that period.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I know nothing about. If they have been going along in the very face of the law, when the language is explicit and clear that they shall not enter into a contract unless on previous notice, at all, under any circumstances, is it a sufficient answer to me, when I call attention to that, to say, that is the construction of the Department, and they have always violated the law? Is that the ground on which the Departments are to be excused for setting at utter disregard those provisions of law which are thrown as safeguards around the Treasury? Why, sir, this is a very singular doctrine; and I am surprised to hear it from the honorable Senator, conservative as he is, and careful as he is to guard the Treasury. Here is a provision existing in the very law organizing these Departments, which says most distinctly that in no case shall a contract be entered into except on previous notice. I show you that these officers have been making these contracts over and over again, to immense amounts, without previous notice; and when I call attention to that subject, and wish to throw an additional safeguard around them as far as I can consistently with the public service, the Senator says they have always disregarded the law, and it would be very inconvenient if you subjected them to that restriction! Sir, if it is not a necessary restriction, repeal the law; but it exists, it has not been repealed, and these repeated violations of it only show the necessity of enforcing it.

Well, sir, how far do I go? Not to say that they shall in no case make any contract, but simply to say that while Congress is in session they shall make none of these contracts, unless they have the money on hand, or unless there is a specific appropriation which will justify it. I say they shall not undertake to run the country into debt while Congress, which alone ought to have the power to create a debt, is in session.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator a question, if he will permit me, on this point, and take it in reference to these very contracts. Leave out our Utah war, and suppose it an Indian war; news reaches the Department here that there is an outbreak committed on the frontier; there are troops in St. Louis; the Department telegraphs to the officer at St. Louis instantly to convey the troops at St. Louis by railroad, as far as the railroad runs, and then to march them to the point of difficulty: will you have him to wait, apply to Congress for authority to make a contract, or else advertise a contract which nobody can fill but the railroad company? There is a case of an emergency for an immediate movement of the troops. Surely, under these circumstances, we could not blame a public officer for making a contract of that kind; and if he believed the emergency for the transportation of the troops was just such as I have explained, what could he do? Come here and ask us to give him authority to contract with the Pacific Railroad Company of Missouri to take his troops? Nobody else could contract for that service. Put in an advertisement? There was nobody to bid. It is a case of what the civilians called vis major. He could not help himself—he would be obliged to do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The case is very plausibly put by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, and I do not say that I would not justify the officer for yielding to so pressing a necessity at the time, and even going beyond, and not stopping to require an authority which he could not get in season. I am not speaking of this particular contract. It might have been that the necessity existed here; but we do not accomplish anything by putting extreme cases. The question is a question important on principle. It is this: whether, while Congress, which is the great power vested by the Constitution with the authority to raise money, is in session, the head of a Department shall have the power (because it is a matter of power) at his discretion to enter into contracts for an expenditure of money that has not been appropriated? That is the question. What is the answer? The answer is, why there may be an extreme urgent case where he would fail to accomplish what needs to be accomplished if he did not do it without waiting for Congress. Is there any doubt that in such a case he would be justified in moving, even without authority?

But this case is put as an excuse for giving him unlimited authority, and not controlling him at all. That is what I am contending against. There might be such a case as the honorable Senator from Louisiana puts; and what should the Secretary of War do if he could not have time to come to Congress, if the thing must be done just as quick as the telegraph would enable him to accomplish it? Do it. I would do it myself under such circumstances, and then I would state to Congress what I had done, and call on them to justify me. If they did not, I would resign my office. But it is a very different question when you come to ask, shall we put this power into the hands of every head of a Department of this Government to make contracts at his discretion when Congress is in session to appropriate money, to run the country into debt simply because a case may arise when he should act without authority? Certainly not.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman will permit me to say a word. I will go with him to the fullest extent. I merely suggested, with reference to these particular appropriations, that I understand all that is claimed is, that this discretion shall remain vested in the Secretary of War alone, and that only as regards transportation and supplies.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Not that all Secretaries should have the power at all times to make contracts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The provision I am speaking of applies to this particular bill. It is simply this: that while Congress is in session, the head of a Department shall not have power to make contracts; and that when Congress is not in session he shall make them on notice. That is my proposition. The Senator talks about notice by sixty days' advertisement in the Washington papers. That is the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, and I am opposed to it, because you must leave the time of notice and the place where to give notice in the hands of the Secretary of War at his discretion. I am not saying that it is absolutely necessary to be concluded that every officer of the Government will cheat if he can. I go on a different principle, and I would leave that point to his discretion; but I want to carry out what the laws have provided for heretofore, and lay down a general principle. There may be a case where it would be necessary to violate it; and what Government would ever hesitate to sustain an officer who honestly did it under such circumstances? But that is a different question from saying that while Congress is in session, the Secretary of War—the question arises here in regard to the Secretary of War, and I will confine it to him—shall have power to make contracts to an unlimited amount, because an emergency might arise at some time when he could not give notice. The question is between principle and possibility. The possibility or emergency, when it arises, must be acted upon; but the mere chance of a possibility is no safe ground on which to vest immense power like this in the hands of any Secretary.

Why, sir, under it you see, at this very time, since Congress has been in session, while we have been here, with no emergency, (because events have proved that there was none,) with no hurry, but in anticipation of the action of Congress in granting five regiments, which hardly anybody here was in favor of granting, contracts have been made to the amount of millions, without consulting Congress at all. That is what I object to, and wish to remedy. As to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Texas to the amendment, I hope it will not be agreed to, and I do not think it ought to be so limited.

Mr. STUART. I am desirous that the amendments which have been offered to-day should appear in print to-morrow, so that we may examine them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) The Chair will state that the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas cannot be received unless by unanimous consent of the Senate, because the yeas and nays had been ordered on the pending amendment before that was offered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought I had submitted my amendment in time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to it if it is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I addressed the Senate before the yeas and nays were ordered to be taken.

Mr. STUART. That question will come up to-morrow, and as we want to see the amendments printed, I move the Senate adjourn.

I am informed that there is a necessity for an executive session, and therefore I withdraw that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time engaged therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 20, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. R. Eckard.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As the pending question on the auxiliary guard bill is a very important one, on which we ought to have a full vote, I suggest that the morning hour be devoted to the call of committees for reports. The pending question in the House will then come up, and we shall get a full vote upon it.

DETENTION OF VESSELS IN CHILI.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to this House such correspondence as may have taken place between the authorities of this Government and that of the Government of Chili in regard to the detention by the latter of the American vessels Good Return and Franklin, at the port of Talcahuana, in the year 1852.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to that, if it is understood that we afterwards proceed to the business of the morning hour.

No objection being made, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of the business of the morning hour.

DES MOINES RAPIDS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say to my friend from North Carolina, that when the Committee on Commerce was called a few days since, I had a report which I wished to make, but I did not do it. I now ask unanimous consent to make the report.

No objection being made, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report in respect to the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

WAGON ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to communicate to this House a copy of the report of the exploration of the wagon road from Fort Defiance to the Colorado River, in the Territory of New Mexico, made by E. F. Beale, Esq., and a copy of a map accompanying the same.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now hope my motion will prevail, as I see the gentleman who is entitled to the floor [Mr. MORRILL] is in his seat.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was not the House, when last in consideration of the business of the morning hour, engaged in the call of committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. It was; but there is a pending report.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman propose to resume the call, commencing where the call was last suspended?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The pending bill is a bill donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] moved to postpone its consideration until Wednesday, the 21st instant; and that the bill, and the report of the majority and views of the minority of the committee, be printed. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] moved to reconsider the bill. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. There has been no measure for years which has received so much attention in the various parts of the country as the one now under consideration, so far as the fact can be proved by petitions which have been received here from the various States, North and South, from State societies, from county societies, and from individuals. They have come in so as to cover almost every day from the commencement of the session.

Before I proceed further, I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw his motion to postpone, in order that I may introduce an amendment, which I propose to offer, merely changing the bill so far as to strike out all in relation to the Territories.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. There is a pending motion to recommit, which must also be withdrawn, before an amendment will be in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I now offer the amendment which I send to the Chair, to come in after the enacting clause, in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill. Mr. Speaker, I know very well that when there is a lack of arguments to be brought against the merits of a measure, the Constitution is fled to as an inexhaustible arsenal of supply. From thence all sorts of missiles may be hurled, and though they "bear wide" of the mark, they do not "kick the owner over." I have also noticed that lions accustomed to roar around the Constitution are quite disposed to slumber whenever it is desirable for certain gentlemen, who carry extra baggage, to leap over the impediment. But, while I do not propose to consider the constitutional argument at any great length, I shall not wholly blink it out of sight; and all the favor asked is, that the Constitution may not be strained and perverted to defeat a measure no less of public good than of public justice—just politically, just to all the States, and just, above all, to the manhood of our country.

We exert our power and expend millions to protect and promote commerce through light-houses, coast surveys, improvement of harbors, and through our Navy and Naval Academy. Our military "crown-jewels" are manufactured at West Point on Government account. We make immense grants of lands to railroads to open new fields of internal trade. We secure to literary labor the protection of copy-right. We encourage the growth and discipline of hardy seamen by eking out their scanty rewards through governmental bounties. We secure to ingenious mechanics high profits by our system of patent-rights. We make munificent grants to secure general education in all the new States. But all direct encouragement to agriculture has been rigidly withheld.

When Commerce comes to our doors, gay in its attire and lavish in its promises, we "hand and deliver" at once our gold. When Manufactures appears, with a needy and downcast look, we tender, at worst, a "compromise." And then the fiery little god of war bristles up and makes havoc of all we have left. So that, when Agriculture appears,

"A creature not too wise or good For human nature's daily food!"— though taxed to support all her sisters and idle brothers, and to espouse their quarrels—we coldly plead there is nothing left for her, and even spurn the admission of her affinity to the family by omitting all mention of her on the records of our statutes. Ceres does not appear among the gods of Olympus—only appears in a picture on one of our Treasury notes!

It is our province, as a nation and as individuals, to do well whatever we undertake. The genius and skill of our artists and artisans have been universally commended. Our naval architecture is a subject of national pride. Our engineers are doomed to no merely local fame. Our agricultural implements are beyond the reach of competition. Yet, while we may be in advance of the civilized world in many of the useful arts, it is a humiliating fact that we are far in the rear of the best husbandry in Europe; and, notwithstanding here and there an elevated spot, our tendency is still downward. Does not our general system of agriculture foreshadow ultimate decay? If so, is it beyond our constitutional power and duty to provide an incidental remedy?

The prosperity and happiness of a large and populous nation depend:

1. Upon the division of the land into small parcels.
2. Upon the education of the proprietors of the soil.

Our agriculturists, as a whole, instead of seeking a higher cultivation, are extending their boundaries; and their education, on the contrary, is limited to the metes and bounds of their forefathers.

If it be true that the common mode of cultivating the soil in all parts of our country is so defective as to make the soil poorer year by year, it is a most deplorable fact, and a fact of national concern. If we are steadily impairing the natural productiveness of the soil, it is a national waste, compensated only by private robbery. What are the facts?

In New England, the pasture-fed stock is not on the increase, and sheep-husbandry is gradually growing of less importance, excepting perhaps in Vermont and New Hampshire. The wheat crop, once abundant, is now inconsiderable. The following table will exhibit something of the depreciation of the crops in ten years:

	Wheat—bushels.		Potatoes—bushels.
	1810.	1850.	1810.	1850.
Connecticut	87,009	41,000	3,414,338	2,689,693
Massachusetts ..	157,933	31,211	5,845,652	3,585,384
Rhode Island ...	3,098	49	911,973	651,929
New Hampshire ..	423,121	185,658	6,205,695	4,591,919
Maine	842,160	296,239	10,502,280	8,436,040
Vermont	495,800	535,955	8,669,751	4,951,014
	2,044,111	1,090,132	35,180,500	19,418,191

In many of the southern States the decreasing production is equally marked

	Wheat, bushels, in 1810.		In 1850.
Tennessee	4,569,693		1,619,388
Kentucky	4,843,152		2,142,622
Georgia	1,891,830		1,088,534
Alabama	858,052		294,044
	12,012,726		5,144,596

These facts, after all proper allowances for errors and a short crop, establish, conclusively, that in all parts of our country important elements in the soil have been exhausted; and its fertility, in spite of all improvements, is steadily sinking. The number of acres of land in use in the State of New York, in 1825, was 7,160,967; in 1855, the number had increased to 26,758,182 acres; but the number of sheep had decreased so that there were nearly three hundred thousand less than there were thirty years ago; and within a period of five years the decrease has been nearly fifty per cent., while the decrease in the number of horses, cows, and swine, is above fifteen per cent. In 1845 the product of wheat was 13,391,770 bushels. It has steadily declined since, until the product of the past year did not exceed 6,000,000 bushels. The average yield of corn per acre in 1844 was 24.75 bushels; but in 1854 it was only 21.02 bushels.

The planting lands of southern States have also greatly deteriorated, and some new fertilizer, beyond rotation of crops, is anxiously sought. The average crop of wheat in Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina for 1850, was only seven bushels per acre. In Alabama and Georgia but five bushels per acre. And even the largest of any State in the Union, that of Massachusetts, was but sixteen bushels per acre; and this, with the leanest soil, proves her agricultural science far in advance of her sister States. While the crop of cotton in the new lands of Texas and Arkansas was seven hundred to seven hundred and fifty pounds per acre, it was but three hundred and twenty pounds per acre in the older cultivated fields of South Carolina.

In a southern journal I find the following statement:

"An Alabama planter says that cotton has destroyed more than earthquakes or volcanic eruptions. Witness the red hills of Georgia and South Carolina, which have produced cotton till the last dying gasp of the soil forbade any further attempt at cultivation; and the land, turned out to nature, reminds the traveler, as he views the dilapidated condition of the country, of the ruins of ancient Greece."

In Virginia, the crop of tobacco in 1850, was less than that of 1840, by over eighteen million pounds. No crop has proved more destructive to the fertility of the soil than the tobacco crop, and this staple commodity, unless a cheap and effective remedy can be found, must be either banished or it will banish the cultivators. In this State, where tobacco, corn, and wheat have been continued for a century, many districts are no longer cultivated. Liebig says, "that from every acre of this land, there were removed in the space of one hundred years, twelve hundred pounds of alkalies, in leaves, grain and straw." In a letter of General Washington, dated August 6, 1786, to a friend (Arthur Young) in England, he writes:

"The system of agriculture, if the epithet system can be applied to it, which is in use in this part of the United States, is as unproductive to the practitioners as it is ruinous to the landholders. Yet it is pertinaciously adhered to."

Writing to the same person at a subsequent date, (December 5, 1791,) he says:

"The English farmer must entertain a contemptible opinion of our husbandry, or a horrid idea of our land, when he is to be informed that not more than eight or ten bushels of wheat is the yield of an acre."

Since these words were written, little has been done to elevate the character of Virginia farming, and Mount Vernon itself, losing the eye of its master, has lapsed into the general degeneracy. While the yield of wheat has increased in England to thirty bushels per acre, it has sunk to seven in Virginia. The opinion of the "English farmer" may be imagined.

In an address of the late Hon. A. Stevenson, in 1850, to the Agricultural Society of Albemarle, in Virginia, he said:

"It can hardly be necessary to attempt to impress upon the depressed and wretched condition of the farming interests throughout the State at large, with the exception of some few portions of it, which constitute honorable and praiseworthy exceptions."

Even in Ohio the wheat crop is already less remunerative than formerly, and fields long cultivated are given up to pasturage. In Indiana, Kentucky and Illinois, where so large an amount of grain is sold and carried off, instead of being fed out to stock, they are selling their lands by the bushel in the shape of wheat and corn, and that for a price utterly ruinous. Commerce, founded upon such agricultural economy as this, must come to an end, although the folly will continue to be avenged on posterity even to the third and fourth generation.

In the agricultural survey of Mississippi, recently published, Mr. Harper, speaking of the system pursued in that State, says:

"This agriculture has hitherto been a very exhausting

one. Mississippi is a new State; it dates its existence only from the year 1818; and notwithstanding all its fertility, a large part of the land is already exhausted; the State is full of old deserted fields."

A recent address issued by the agricultural convention in South Carolina, declares:

"Our stocks of hogs, horses, mules, and cattle are diminishing in size and decreasing in number, and our purses are being strained for their last cent to supply their places from the northwestern States."

In the late message of the Governor of Georgia, he eloquently discants upon the "educational wants" of his State, and, among many other facts, he notices "the exhaustion of the soil under a system of agriculture that glories in excluding the application of scientific principles."

My time will not permit a greater accumulation of evidence on this point, although I have a cloud of witnesses in reserve, nor is pointing out the nakedness of the land an agreeable duty. The leading fact, however, of a wide-spread deterioration of the soil, stands out too boldly to be denied. The great, irreversible law of American agriculture appears in the constant and increasing diminution of agricultural products, without any advance in prices. It follows, just in proportion, that capital is disappearing, and that labor receives a diminishing reward. Our country is growing debilitated, and we propagate the consumptive disease with all the energy of private enterprise and public patronage.

There is little doubt but that three fourths of the arable land of our whole country is more or less subjected to this process of exhaustion. It has been estimated by Dr. Lee, of Georgia, that the annual income of the soil of not less than one hundred millions of acres of land in the United States is diminishing at the rate of ten cents an acre. This would amount to $10,000,000, and involve the loss of a capital of $166,666,666 annually. A sum greater than all our national and State taxation!

Men waste hundreds of acres of land on the theory that it is inexhaustible, whose entire wealth might not purchase the raw materials—the magnesia, lime, soda, potash, phosphorus, sulphur, carbon, nitrogen, &c.—necessary to make a single acre possessing primitive fertility. Thus the accumulated store of ages passes away in a single generation.

And this waste of soil is not the only thing wasted. For want of the knowledge and skill which the institutions aimed at can alone impart, Colonel Wilder, a gentleman of well-earned fame, estimates the annual loss of the single State of Massachusetts, in the one product of her cereal grains, at $2,000,000. Another gentleman, in the same State, of great experience in the line of stock, dairy, &c., reports the loss from the same ignorance and unskillfulness in these interests, at $15,000,000 for that State alone. The loss of New York, upon her four hundred and forty-seven thousand and fourteen horses, (and Ohio, by the census of 1850, had more,) through the universal incompetency in the veterinary art, has been reckoned at not less than two million dollars. The horse, that "wonder of nature," so universally adored by man, for the slightest ailment, is handed over to the butchers of quackery, whose practice is more fatal than that ascribed even to Dr. Hornbook:

"Folk maan do something for their bread,
An' eae maan Death."

We are indebted to Europe for our civilized inhabitants, and for nearly all of our domestic animals, whatever the testimony of the rocks may be as to the preëxistence of the latter. The soil we have acquired by the displacement of the red man. The only thing we constantly dwell upon with complacency is, that we surpass the stock from which we sprang, and that we present our land better than we found it. But this is not beautiful unless true!

We bring forth new States by the litter, and when we want more, like our Norman ancestors, we commit "grand larceny," and annex them. This progress seems wonderful, but with it appears the bitter fact that these new States in half a century—a brief time in the history of States—become depleted and stationary. This early maturity is followed by sudden barrenness.

Concerted effort is necessary to educate and elevate whole nations. That effort is being made abroad with governmental aid in the lead. Here, in the "model Republic," where a free republican government is installed to guard the general welfare, no such effort is being made. Government has not yet followed the lead of the people, even afar off. We do not ask for constant and persistent outlay and guidance; but a recognition for once, and in the most convenient mode, of the propriety of encouraging useful knowledge among farmers and mechanics, in order to enlarge our productive power, give intelligence to those who will esteem it a higher boon than land or titles, and relieve ourselves from the thralldom of a debt due to holders abroad, for the little agricultural science we now have, and which is quite unsafe to use, by reason of the great differences of soil and climate.

Many foreign States support a population vastly larger per square mile than we maintain, and hold their annual increase; but, by the system of husbandry generally pursued here, the land is held until it is robbed of its virtue, skimmed of its cream, and then the owner, selling his wasted field to some skinflint neighbor, flies to fresh fields with the foul purpose to repeat the same spoliation; and this annual exodus which prevails over all the older States, and even begins upon the first settlements of the new States before their remote borders have lost sight of the savage, painfully indicates that we have reached the maximum of population our land will support in the present state of our agricultural economy. Our skill must be further developed, or here is our limit. A fever-and-ague progress, warmed by speculative excitements, and chilled by panics, may be kept up while our unpeopled public domain is supposed to be inexhaustible, and while those who buy, buy to sell, and never otherwise intend "to hold or drive." But there is a barrier already visible, more impassable than the Rocky Mountains, the great sand plains stretching North and South, commencing near the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude, or about the center of Kansas, and running to the Rocky Mountains, so barren of soil, water, timber, and all vegetation, as to preclude the possibility of settlement by civilized inhabitants. Here the wave must be stayed; but shall we not prove unworthy of our patrimony if we run over the whole before we learn how to manage a part?

We are dilated with the notion that, as a nation, we may now claim rank with the oldest, the best, and the strongest. Our population is rapidly increasing, and brings annually increased demands for bread and clothing. If we can barely meet this demand while we have fresh soils to appropriate, we shall early reach the point of our decline and fall. The nation which tills the soil so as to leave it worse than they found it, is doomed to decay and degradation. Other nations lead us, not in the invention and handling of improved implements, but in nearly all the practical sciences which can be brought to aid the management and results of agricultural labor. We owe it to ourselves not to become a weak competitor in the most important field where we are to meet the world as rivals. It touches us in tenderest points, our national honor as well as our private pockets. While we ought to possess the granary of the world, it has been but a brief time since bread-stuffs rose almost to starvation point, and indicated the possibility that we might not forever escape the only test, that of famine, to which our institutions have not been subjected. Able to be independent, in a broader sense than any other people, having an area ninety-five times as large as England and seventeen times as large as Belgium, yet over one hundred million of our imports of the last fiscal year were products mainly of the soil.

It was not until Rome, deluded with military conquests and luxurious living, had become largely indebted to her conquered provinces for her agricultural products, that the "populous north" poured forth that rude horde which obtained the mastery and accomplished the downfall of the Roman Empire.

Agriculture undoubtedly demands our first care; because its products, in the aggregate, are not only of greater value than those of any other branch of industry, but greater than all others together; and because it is not merely conducive to the health of society, the health of trade and of commerce, but essential to their very existence. But, while it is the most useful and earliest of arts, so sluggish have been its advances that we are yet experimenting upon problems which were moot-points with farmers two thousand years ago. Surely an interest so superior, and of such vital consequence, ought not to be left to lingering routine, but the aid of science should be invoked to accelerate its pace, until it can keep step with that of other industrial pursuits of mankind.

The agriculturists have been, within a few years, aroused to their own wants. Periodicals, from a higher point of dignity and influence, have fired their zeal. The eager crowds which throng to the annual fairs of our agricultural societies, from the National down to "all the stars of lesser magnitude," proclaim the universal hunger there is for a profounder information touching that which comes home to their business and bosoms. They know there are mysteries dearly concerning them, and they demand of learning and of science a solution. "Deformed, unfinished," experiments——"scarce half made up,

And that so lamely"— will not do. Farmers will not be cheated longer by unsustained speculations. The test of the field must follow and verify that of the laboratory. The half-bushel and the balance must prove the arithmetic. The result must support the theory. They want substance and not a shadow—bread and not a stone. They know well there is a vast force of agricultural labor hitherto misapplied, muscles that sow where they do not reap, and they demand light—demand to have their arms unpinioned! What has been an art merely to supply physical wants must become a science—though it wears doing the same service, but more abundantly, and also doing something to satisfy and elevate the manhood of the mass of the people. Let us have such colleges as may rightfully claim the authority of teachers to announce facts and fixed laws, and to scatter broadcast that knowledge which will prove useful in building up a great nation—great in its resources of wealth and power, but greatest of all in the aggregate of its intelligence and virtue.

"hadden gray and a' that"—

The mineral wealth of our country, already disclosed, assumes almost unbounded proportions; but destitute of experience as we are, and largely dependent upon the skill of those but half-taught from other lands, our mines are much less remunerative than they would be under the control of Americans, with some fundamental instruction in their vocation.

There is no class of our community of whom we may be so justly proud as our mechanics. Their genius is patent to all the world. For labor-saving contrivances, their tact seems universal; and when any one of them is detailed to do the breathing of any engine, he speedily furnishes lungs for the engine to do that sort of work for itself. But they snatch their education, such as it is, from the crevices between labor and sleep. They grope in twilight. Our country relies upon them as its right arm to do the handiwork of the nation. Let us, then, furnish the means for that arm to acquire culture, skill, and efficiency.

We have schools to teach the art of manslaughter and to make masters of "deep-throated engines" of war; and shall we not have schools to teach men the way to feed, clothe, and enlighten the great brotherhood of man? It is just on the part of statesmen and legislators, just on the part of other learned professions, that they should aid to elevate the class upon whom they lean for support, and upon whom they depend for their audience. There is no clashing of interests. It is not designed to make every man his own doctor, or every man his own lawyer; but to make every man understand his own business. A lawyer is not the worse for having an intelligent client, nor a clergyman the worse for having a prosperous parishioner. Our present literary colleges need have no more jealousy of agricultural colleges than a porcelain manufactory would have of an iron foundry. They move in separate spheres, without competition, and using no raw material that will diminish the supply of one or the other.

The farmer and the mechanic require special schools and appropriate literature quite as much as any one of the so-called learned professions. The practical sciences are nowhere else called into such repeated and constant requisition. Would it be sound policy for one who expected to expound Blackstone to limit his reading to a muck manual or to agricultural chemistry? If it would not, how are we to expect one to solve all the scientific relations of earth, water, air, and vegetable and animal life, who has only explored reading, writing, and arithmetic?

All other professions and pursuits reckon among their brightest jewels men who were recruited from the robust ranks of agriculture. It is the untainted blood from this source that supplies the waste in the pulpit, the bar, the forum, and the camp. No other pursuit in life obtains this universal tribute, that, whatever may be the present idol of devotion, all classes and ranks of men hope to reach that estate first bestowed upon Adam, and become proprietors of the soil as their ultimate earthly paradise. Washington, Calhoun, Clay, and Webster, are more secure of love and homage as farmers than even as men of highest public renown; and Mount Vernon, Fort Hill, Ashland, and Marshfield, the Meccas of America, prove the ideal truth of the words of Pliny, that "the earth took delight in being tilled by the hands of men crowned with laurels and decorated with triumphant honors."

Many of the purest embellishments of literature have been drawn from the field of the husbandman. Gems, not only of poetry and song, but of painting and sculpture, of philosophy and eloquence, thus have their origin. Let agriculture, then, make its reprisals, and build up a literature at once intelligible and satisfactory for its millions of thinkers.

We need a careful, exact, and systematized registration of experiments—such as can be made at thoroughly scientific institutions, and such as will not be made elsewhere. These tests and these tables, so furnished, will give us, when reported and collated, as is provided for in this bill, a rational induction of principles upon which we may expect to establish a proper science; and the more widely gathered are the facts, the sounder the science. The discoveries of Columbus-struck amateurs will not be trumpeted forth until they have received the sanction of a body less sanguine than the vendors of a patent. Spurious dogmas will be touched lightly with the spear of Ithuriel, and no longer squat around the ears of weary plowmen.

We need to test the natural capability of soils and the power of different fertilizers; the relative value of different grasses for flesh, fat, and milk-giving purposes; the comparative value of grain, roots, and hay, for wintering stock; the value of a bushel of corn, oats, peas, carrots, potatoes, or turnips, in pounds of beef, pork, or mutton; deep plowing as well as drainage; the vitality and deterioration of seeds; breeds of animals; remedies for the potato disease and for all tribes of insects destructive to cotton, wheat, and fruit crops. These, and many more, are questions of scientific interest even beyond their economical importance in the researches of the agriculturist.

The philosophy of manures, or of giving plants their appropriate food, is in its infancy. In England they have, through the process of feeding wheat, raised the average yield to double its former amount. Liebig, employed in 1840 by the Royal Agricultural Society, was almost the first, after Sir Humphrey Davy, to practically apply agricultural chemistry so as to arrest the attention of farmers. It was at his suggestion, only seventeen years ago, that guano was brought into notice. In 1851, notwithstanding its extravagant price, England imported two hundred and forty-three thousand and fourteen tons of this concentrated fertilizer, proving that the fabled eggs of the golden goose have been eclipsed in value by the "evacuations of sea-gulls."

It is plainly an indication that education is taking a step in advance when public sentiment begins to demand that the faculties of young men shall be trained with some reference to the vocation to which they are to be devoted through life. It is clear that intellectual discipline can be obtained under more than one mode, and, if the primary education sought for this purpose can be afterwards applied to practical use in the destined occupation, it is a point clearly gained. Law, theology, and medicine, have been specialties from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Special schools for art, trade, and commerce, though of later growth, have been long established in many places throughout Europe, and in our own American cities. In some places these institutions, intended to be practical rather than speculative, go by the not inapt name of Real Schools. Agricultural colleges and schools in many portions of Europe are a marked feature of the age. In our own country the general want of such places of instruction has been so manifest that States, societies, and individuals, have attempted to supply it, though necessarily in stunted measure. The "plentiful lack" of funds has retarded their maturity and usefulness; but there are some examples, like that of Michigan, liberally supported by the State, in the full tide of successful experiment. Adequate means to start on a scale commensurate with the great objects in view seems an indispensable prerequisite. States have been unable to impose at once the increased taxation that would be required, and the liberality of private individuals has been unequal to the task. But if this bill shall pass, the institutions of the character required by the people, and by our native land, would spring into life, and not languish from poverty, doubt, or neglect. They would prove (if they should not literally, like the schools of ancient Sparta, hold the children of the State) the perennial nurseries of patriotism, thrift and liberal information—places "where men do not decay." They would turn out men for solid use, and not drones. It may be assumed that tuition would be free, and that the exercise of holding the plow and swinging the scythe—every whit as noble, artistic, and graceful, as the postures of the gymnastic or military drill—would go far towards defraying all other expenses of the students. Muscles hardened by such training would not become soft in summer or torpid in winter; and the graduates would know how to sustain American institutions with American vigor.

It is desirable that the agricultural hive, in all its industrial ramifications, should furnish such generous rewards, such noble incentives, as to reclaim the truants who have fled to and clog and embarrass other pursuits and professions with untrained adventurers. The New York Mercantile Agency states the number of stores in the United States at 204,061, which would be about one store to every one hundred and twenty-three inhabitants. This shows

"Trade wields the sword; and Agriculture leaves
Her half-turned furrows; other harvests fire
An avenger of renown."

I suppose that it might be a fair estimate to say that eighty out of every hundred of these traders become insolvent every ten years. But had they invested their capital and labor in agriculture, it may be safely assumed that not twenty out of every hundred would have failed to secure a competency.

Adam Smith, after having noticed "the precarious and uncertain possession" of capital engaged in commerce and manufactures, says:

"That which arises from the more solid improvements of agriculture is much more durable, and cannot be destroyed but by those more violent convulsions occasioned by the depredations of hostile and barbarous nations continued for a century or two together."

Mr. Speaker, when a money pressure overtakes the country, like that through which we are just passing, in searching for its cause no one thinks of charging it upon agriculturists. They are not only industrious, but frugal. Thrift is their cardinal virtue. They do not produce, vend, nor consume luxuries. They hasten slowly, and go untouched of all epidemical speculations. But when the crisis comes—when commerce, manufactures, banks, and even Government itself, quail beneath the storm—all eyes turn to the hardy tillers of the soil for relief. They stand, as they always stand, with enough for themselves and something to spare. They furnish raw material, freight, means of liquidation or of supply; and yet, when they would be even more useful, shall we pronounce them unworthy, and deny them opportunity?

It is one of the political axioms of the writer already quoted, everywhere accredited, that national wealth is greatly increased or diminished by the more or less skill, dexterity, and judgment, with which labor is generally applied. As legislators, we can have no subject before us of higher intrinsic importance.

Manufacturers, when their books disclose a losing business, change to a different class of goods; merchants, in like circumstances, to a different trade and other markets; but all history shows the tenacity with which habits acquired in the cultivation of land cling to a people from generation to generation. In all ages farmers have been stable, conservative, and reverent to antiquity. The same plow as described three thousand years ago at

"Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts is still in use among the modern Greeks. The habitant of Canada as much believes to-day in the propriety of placing the yoke on to the horns of the ox, in order to secure the entire strength of the animal, as he did in the days when he owed allegiance to the Grand Monarch. The old Roman plow, sometimes drawn, in the days of Nero, "by a wretched ass on the one side, and an old woman on the other," still retains its place in Italy, and in parts of Spain and the south of France. If we turn to the descendants of the Puritans, we shall find some of these yet kill their pork and plant their corn in "the old of the moon." In all ages, and in all countries, the habits, as well as the virtues of agriculturists, remain fixed.

Agricultural men dwell apart. Their business keeps them at home, and they cannot combine to secure general improvements, or to make their complaints heard. They suffer in silence—the rolling years only noted by "seed time and harvest."

All over the highest civilized parts of Europe we find the different Governments alive to the wants of agriculture. They have established ministers of instruction, model farms, experimental farms, botanical gardens, colleges, and a large number of secondary schools, with no other purpose—and they need no higher or nobler—than the improvement of the industrial resources—the farms and the farmers—of the respective countries. All these are chiefly supported by large annual expenditures of the different Governments, except so far as any may be self-supporting institutions. The effect is in the largest degree favorable to the people and to increased production. But the teachings of European professors are of little consequence to Americans, even if they could be comprehended and instantaneously adopted, as they are rarely suited to our circumstances. Can we not have something that we may claim as our own? Young Americans should have some chance to study agriculture as a profession, and be attracted to it as to a learned, liberal, and intellectual pursuit. Is it true, as our detractors assert, that science can flourish only under the patronage of royalty?

This system of education is known to be more complete in Prussia than in any other nation of Europe. It may be said that all the children attend school until they are thirteen years old; and agricultural colleges, and schools for the mechanic arts and higher trades, are liberally sustained, and with a much larger staff of professors than is common in the United States. This nation is making rapid progress in wealth and intelligence.

In Saxony they have a number of experiment stations, or experimental farms, with laboratories attached, and five or more schools exclusively for agriculture. There is no country in the world where agriculture and all branches of industry are pursued with more enterprise and success than in the little monarchy of Saxony; and there, of 315,185 children between the ages of six and fourteen years, 311,454 were, in 1851, in actual attendance at school.

Belgium has its agricultural schools also, and great opportunities for general education are given, especially in the larger towns. Here farming is conducted most on a scientific basis; and Belgium, supporting a population of three hundred and thirty-six to the square mile, in a climate inferior to that of Kentucky or Virginia, averaging only twenty-six and twenty-three to the square mile, is the first in rank as an agricultural State in Europe. Its once noted battle-fields are now equally noted as model farms. This preëminence is chiefly the result of scientific attention to manures.

France, from the time of Napoleon, has done much for agriculture. Beet-sugar, the mulberry, the grape, as well as Merino sheep and the Thibet goat, have received imperial attention. No expense in France is shirked in the cause of agricultural science. Her botanical gardens, chemical laboratories, physiological museums, and schools for instructions in the veterinary art, surpass all others in existence, and with her five agricultural colleges, and almost one hundred inferior agricultural schools are performing herculean labors for the elevation of the farming population of the empire. The Revolution and the successive wars loaded France with an immense debt; but this was rapidly extinguished from the never-failing resources of her soil. The abrogation of the game laws and many other feudal enactments has aided her progress, but the breaking up and division of every estate at the death of the owner, doubtless retards much of permanent improvement. But for this abuse of a true principle, and the illiterate condition of her people, France would have been the pioneer of rural economy.

As it is, we look more to England and Scotland, and to Ireland to some extent, for principles and facts for our instruction. Here we find agriculture developed in all its noblest attitudes. Science, wealth, taste, mind, and rank, combine to increase its profit, beauty, and honor. The large fortunes of individuals enable Science to delve constantly in its behalf; but the Government, far from thinking that enough, annually contributes liberally to the same object, especially in Ireland. Colleges and schools of agriculture are numerous in Great Britain, but their usefulness is greatly restricted on account of the limited attendance arising from the jealousies of caste. Agricultural improvement is imposed on such a people from necessity. The heavy taxation, the enormous consumption of luxuries, and density of population, could not be otherwise supported. Science, like the rod of Aaron, has touched the soil, and behold! the crops are doubled. Nothing but this in Ireland could have checked the dispersion of a nation—a nation, too, that in ten years preceding 1846, exported more grain than all of the United States. Notwithstanding the magnificent proportions of her commerce, freckling all seas with its flag, and notwithstanding her all-embracing manufactures, with their countless fires blazing day and night, England, were her agriculture to retrograde, or the land fail "to yield her increase," would be numbered with things that were, and the earth no more rock at the sound of Trafalgar or Waterloo.

The Government of Russia, the growing giant of Europe, has recently taken a conspicuous lead in the education of its people, and the cause of agriculture there holds a deserved prominence. Of colleges, schools, and special schools devoted to agriculture, Russia maintains a greater number than any other nation, France only excepted. No nation has arisen in the political firmament with a steadier splendor than the great northern bear, which, instead of pawing, like Milton's lion, "his hinder-parts to get free" from the mud of the Nile, is struggling to get free from the Polar ice of ignorance. The back-bone of Russia, in her recent contest, lay in her agricultural forces, and against these but half-tutored resources of men and wealth, half the strength of Europe could only wage a drawn battle. Here we find a despotism, from motives merely of governmental policy, elevating labor, placing it within the power of her agriculturists and artisans to become educated and skillful, while our people with the Government in their own hands, parley on the brink, and do nothing for their own benefit.

Spain is weak in all her industry, because, while an uneducated Spanish gentleman, it is said, cannot be found, so neither can a peasant be found who can read or write.

Italy, anciently far in advance of all her cotemporaries, in theory and practice, is now behind all other States in her farming and industrial pursuits, and here we find but one person in fifty provided with any instruction whatever.

I might contrast Bohemia with Saxony, and even Ireland with England, or the different cantons of Switzerland with each other, to show the difference between ignorant and educated culture of the soil, but I have not space.

Thus, we behold the suffrages of all the wiser civilized nations in favor of the measure contemplated by the bill under consideration; examples as much to be imitated as those of an opposite character are to be shunned. If other nations advance, though we but pause, we are distanced. The voice of our country, if it could find utterance, is believed to be overwhelmingly in favor of the establishment of these institutions on our own soil. They are as much needed and will be as gratefully accepted in one direction of our country as another. More than four fifths of our population are engaged in agricultural and mechanical employments. This vast number out of thirty millions of people now, to be increased to fifty millions in less than twenty years, will forever furnish an inexhaustible supply of pupils who will not forsake their calling. Is it not of grave importance to give this vast force an intelligent direction?

In 1850 there were, between the ages of five and fifteen, 5,106,257 inhabitants of our country. There were engaged in the professions of law, medicine, and theology, 94,575 citizens, and in all the colleges of the United States there were 27,159 pupils only. If these pupils required two hundred and thirty-nine colleges for their instruction, how many ought we to have for the sons of the millions engaged in agriculture? Why, sir, the number which it may be hoped will be provided for under the auspices of this bill will hardly do more for some years than to supply teachers that will be required in secondary schools.

At the close of the Revolution there was much difficulty about these lands. The States within whose boundaries the ungranted crown lands were situated felt disposed to claim them, unjustly as the other States thought, as State property. But finally all yielded to the Union, using in their conveyance words of like import—that the lands should be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of all. Since then the revolutionary debt has been extinguished; gratitude for military services has been acknowledged to the extent of forty-four million one hundred and nine thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine acres; new States have been properly treated with statesman-like liberality; now by this bill the old States, by whose blood and treasure the public domain was so largely acquired, will be allowed some direct share, but not greater than that of others, in the distribution. What clause in the constitution interposes any barrier to this?

It cannot be pretended that this is one of a class of cases; for here is one where four fifths of all the people are directly, and all the rest indirectly, interested. No other can come up representing more than a fractional part of the remaining fifth. Our Government is also directly interested, as the holder and dealer in large tracts of land. If it be for the interest of small holders of land, it must be for the interest of a large holder. There is not even an exclusion of those who do not cultivate their land. If the measure shall in any degree increase the future profits of cultivators, the value of all land, wherever it may be, whether held in small or large quantities, will be augmented. The cotton-gin has hardly done more to raise the price of estates in the South, than would now the discovery of a remedy for the boll-worm, and other destructive insects, which gore and gorge the cotton-plant; nor have the reaping machines been of more advantage to western wheat fields, than would be a cure for the wheat midge. These invaders may not be overcome; may not be within the reach of human ingenuity; one sixth part of the cotton and wheat crop may still be lost; but some resulting improvements may safely be predicated upon the labors of thirty-two or more institutions actively engaged in scientific agriculture. There can be no doubt that the benefits to be derived, will prove an ample consideration for the lands disposed of. One of the most adequate considerations ever received for any estate by parent, is called, in legal parlance, "love and affection;" and that also will not be wanting here.

These considerations are tendered by those elder States, to whose toils and expenditures the marketable value of our public domain is so largely indebted. Blot out the canals and railroads of Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio, costing over two hundred million dollars, and the buffalo and the fur-trader on the western prairies might strive for the mastery, but civilization would postpone her triumphs over the savage to a remoter age. Our "western empire" might be taxed the whole cost of the New York and Erie canal, and then be the gainer; and yet the bill I am advocating will not appropriate, among all the States, one fifth part of its original cost, and not one half of the amount of the yet unpaid canal debt of New York.

The third section of article four of the Constitution declares:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Here is the whole of it; and there is no restriction save that in the deeds of cession. Our public lands are no longer pledged for a national debt; and, if held for the common benefit of all, how can it be wrong to give all their rightful and exact proportion to the limited extent now proposed? Who will be wronged? What better thing shall we do with them? Whatever discordant opinions there may have recently existed touching the true interpretation of this clause, as to persons, no one will pretend that it does not give complete control over the land (the property) belonging to the United States; and the measure I am considering is a literal compliance with the powers conferred in that it proceeds "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations" respecting so much as is embraced in the bill.

Grants of lands during and since 1850 have been made to ten States and one Territory, to aid in the construction of more than fifty railroads, of an extent of about nine thousand miles, amounting to 25,403,993 acres. These grants were made on the argument of "prudent proprietorship," and alternate sections were given away to double the price of the remainder. Whether the policy will result in any loss to the Government or not, these States were treated with a liberality they will never forget. As a prudent proprietor, may we not do that which will not only tend to raise the value of all land, whether owned by individuals or by Government, but make agricultural labor more profitable and more desirable as a pursuit in life?

Up to the 30th of June, 1857, we had ungrudgingly donated to different States and Territories sixty-seven million seven hundred and thirty-six thousand five hundred and seventy-two acres of land for schools and universities. No one shall be twitted for such acts by me; but, if the purpose be a noble one as applied to a Territory sparsely populated, it is certainly not less so to States thickly peopled. If such donations are constitutional to inchoate States, can they be unconstitutional when proposed to the Old Dominion, the Empire, Keystone, and Little Rhody? Is there a more urgent demand for such aid in behalf of the people of a Territory free of debt, whose frame of government is supported by the nation, than in behalf of States bearing all the debt and burdens of the national Government, and bending under $245,211,250 of present State indebtedness? Surely the endowment of agricultural colleges ought not to depend upon the resources of States already so oppressively laden, nor upon the come-by-chance charities of individuals, but upon the liberal administration of the Government which has been expressly constituted the trustee of an ample store for the common benefit of all the States.

The executive and legislative precedents which can be arrayed to sustain the principles embodied in this measure are of great weight and authority. Commencing with those coeval with the Constitution, and continuing to a recent date, we have the opinions and acts of men that few at the present day would not think it robbery to claim for any favorite an equality.

Washington brought the subject of agriculture before Congress in his first message. He thought it a subject within the constitutional jurisdiction, and his experience increased that conviction; for in his last message, December 7, 1796, he recurs to it with elaborate argument. He says:

"It will not be doubted that, with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity, this task becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety?"

Thus we have the very germ of the whole project. "The cultivation of the soil," institutions "supported by the public purse," he exclaims, "to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety?" It cannot be doubted that donations of land for agricultural colleges would have received the approval of Washington. He proceeds:

"I have heretofore proposed to the consideration of Congress the expediency of establishing a national university, and also a military academy. The desirableness of both these institutions has so constantly increased with every new view I have taken of the subject, that I cannot omit the opportunity of, once for all, recalling your attention to them.

"The assembly to which I address myself is too enlightened not to be fully sensible how much a flourishing state of the arts and sciences contributes to national prosperity and reputation. True it is, that our country, much to its honor, contains many seminaries of learning, highly respectable and useful; but the funds upon which they rest are too narrow to command the ablest professors in the different departments of liberal knowledge for the institution contemplated, though they would be excellent auxiliaries."

This will be enough to satisfy all as to the opinions of Washington. Let us now see what were the opinions of Jefferson. In his sixth message he thus speaks:

"Education is here placed among the articles of public care; not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal; but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country, and some of them to its preservation."

The message goes on to show that if public moneys were to be used for roads and canals, an amendment of the Constitution would be necessary, but that land might be used for that purpose without an amendment. He then proceeds to urge his favorite university thus:

"The present consideration of a national establishment for education, particularly, is rendered proper by this circumstance also, that if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be amongst the earliest to produce the necessary income. This foundation would have the advantage of being independent in war, which may suspend other improvements, by requiring for its own purposes the resources destined for them."

I submit that here the whole question of constitutional power is covered, as well as a powerful argument suggested, by Jefferson.

For want of time, all reference to Madison, Monroe, and Adams, must be omitted. Jackson was the steadfast friend of agriculture, and the first, in 1837, to call into the Patent Office a practical farmer (Mr. Ellsworth) to collect statistics. As Senator, General Jackson voted a township of land to La Fayette. He approved, June 30, 1834, of giving thirty-six sections of land to the Polish exiles expelled from Europe by Austria. He approved, April 2, 1830, of a bill giving land to a State for the construction of the Miami canal. January 13, 1831, he approved of a bill granting a single section for schools, in Lawrence, Mississippi. March 2, 1833, an act was passed changing the Illinois canal grant to a railroad grant, with obligations attached. This was approved by General Jackson. That part of the Cumberland road in Ohio was surrendered in 1831, and that in Virginia in 1833, to the respective States, with a compact that they should keep the same in repair and collect the tolls—approved by General Jackson, and the act decided since to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. General Jackson rejected the land bill of 1833, mainly for the reason that it first gave to the States wherever the lands might lie, twelve and a half per cent. before there was to be any division among the other States. This he denounced as injustice and inequality. It is enough to say that no such objections can be raised against the division proposed now. There can be no question that General Jackson and the men who cooperated with him would have approved of grants of land to all the States for the benefit of agricultural colleges.

The bill donating lands to the State of Connecticut, for a seminary of learning for the deaf and dumb, passed the Senate in 1819, without even a call of the yeas and nays. The bill approved January 29, 1827, donating lands to Kentucky for a seminary of learning for the deaf and dumb, passed the Senate by a vote of 27 to 6; and we find such men as King of Alabama, Johnson of Kentucky, Benton of Missouri, Eaton and White of Tennessee, and Woodbury of New Hampshire, voting for the measure. In the House, the bill passed by 120 to 43; and among the yeas will be found the names of James Buchanan, James K. Polk, Cambreleng, Livingston, McDuffie, and Wickliffe. Surely these are no mean authorities on constitutional questions, to be added to the names of Crawford, Monroe, Calhoun, Webster, Clay, and Clay-ton. In 1838, a township of land in Florida was granted to Dr. Henry Perrine, to "promote the cultivation of tropical plants." In 1841, there was donated to each of the new States five hundred thousand acres of land. The present law, now on our Statutes at Large, is, that when duties are brought down below twenty per cent., the proceeds of the public lands are to be distributed to the States. Congress donated to the State of Tennessee, August 6, 1846, of unproductive lands lying in that State, one million three hundred thousand acres, on the condition that the State should endow and establish a college, at an expense of not less than forty thousand dollars. Over fifty million acres of swamp lands have been given to different States. President Taylor, in his message of 1849, says:

"No direct aid has been given by the General Government to the improvement of agriculture, except by the expenditure of small sums for the collection and publication of agricultural statistics, and for some chemical analyses, which have been, thus far, paid for out of the patent fund. This aid, in my opinion, is wholly inadequate."

President Fillmore, in his message of 1850, says:

"Agriculture may justly be regarded as the great interest of our people. Four fifths of our active population are employed in the cultivation of the soil; and the expansion of our settlements over new territory is daily adding to the number engaged in that vocation. Justice and sound policy, therefore, alike require that the Government should use all the means authorized by the Constitution to promote the interests and welfare of that important class of our fellow-citizens. And yet it is a singular fact that, whilst the manufacturing and commercial interests have engaged the attention of Congress during a large portion of every session, and our statutes abound in provisions for their protection and encouragement, little has yet been done directly for the advancement of agriculture. It is time that this reproach to our legislation should be removed; and I sincerely hope that the present Congress will not close their labors without adopting efficient means to supply the omissions of those who have preceded them."

The constitutionality of a measure does not depend upon the amount, but upon the principle involved. The citations made show that there is a great preponderance, almost uninterrupted from the foundation of the Government, of executive, legislative, and judicial authority, to prove that the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands at its discretion is plain, absolute, and unlimited. The derivative title to a moiety of the lands imposes a condition upon the disposal of that portion so derived—a condition itself persuasively urging our present object—which is "for the use and common benefit of all the States."

While agriculture has been a neglected field of legislation, it does not now call for the exercise of novel constitutional power. Congress has long asserted the right to dispose of the public lands to establish school funds and universities, and no one now questions the soundness of such a policy. This measure is but an extension of the same principle over a wider field—wider in its applications, but not wider in its amount, for the number of acres now proposed for all the States is scarcely larger than have been donated to individual States. It is general and not local in its reach. If we have the power to make special grants, in particular and individual cases, we certainly have the power, and it would be far more just and expedient to exercise it, in its general application. Pass this measure and we shall have done—

- Something to enable the farmer to raise two blades of grass instead of one;
- Something for every owner of land;
- Something for all who desire to own land;
- Something for cheap scientific education;
- Something for every man who loves intelligence and not ignorance;
- Something to induce the father's sons and daughters to settle and cluster around the old homesteads;
- Something to remove the last vestige of pauperism from our land;
- Something for peace, good order, and the better support of Christian churches and common schools;
- Something to enable sterile railroads to pay dividends;
- Something to enable the people to bear the enormous expenditures of the national Government;
- Something to check the passion of individuals, and of the nation, for indefinite territorial expansion and ultimate decrepitude;
- Something to prevent the dispersion of our population, and to concentrate it around the best lands of our country—places hallowed by church spires, and mellowed by all the influences of time—where the consumer will be placed at the door of the producer; and thereby

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 107.

Something to obtain higher prices for all sorts of agricultural productions; and Something to increase the loveliness of the American landscape. Scientific culture is the sure precursor of order and beauty. Our esthetic Diedrich Knickerbockers, who have no land, will have a fairer opportunity to become great admirers of land that belongs to others.

Many of our wisest statesmen have denounced our general land system as a prolific source of corruption; but what corruption can flow from endowing agricultural colleges? Here is neither profligacy nor waste, but a measure of justice and beneficence. Without meaning to express my opinion for or against the homestead policy, I ask, in all candor, what man is there in the whole length and breadth of our country, who would not prefer, if he could have his choice, such an education as might be obtained at one of these colleges to a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land?

The persuasive arguments of precedents; the example of our worthiest rivals in Europe; the rejuvenation of worn-out lands, which bring forth taxes only; the petitions of farmers everywhere, yearning for "a more excellent way;" philanthropy, supported by our own highest interests—all these considerations impel us for once to do something for agriculture worthy of its national importance.

By the recent statement of the Land Office, we have 1,088,792,498 acres of land to dispose of; and when this bill shall have passed, there will then remain about one thousand and eighty-three millions of acres. We shall still be the largest landholder in the world, while confessedly we are not the best farmers. Let it never be said we are "the greatest and the meanest of mankind."

I now submit my substitute, and move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to submit a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that the sense of the House may be tested? I will then vote for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; I must decline to do it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then if the previous question be sustained I shall move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Vermont is certainly pursuing a different course from what he proposed, in moving to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

The substitute proposed by Mr. MORRILL is as follows:

A bill donating public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be granted to the several States, for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, five millions, nine hundred and twenty thousand acres of land, to be apportioned to each State a quantity equal to twenty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress, to which the States are now respectively entitled.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the land aforesaid, after being surveyed, shall be apportioned to the several States, in sections or subdivisions of sections, not less than one quarter of a section; and whenever there are public lands in a State, worth $1 25 per acre, (the value of said lands to be determined by the Governor of said State,) the quantity to which said State shall be entitled, shall be selected from such lands, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to issue to those States in which there are no public lands of the value of $1 25 per acre, land scrip to the amount of their distributive shares in acres under the provisions of this act, said scrip to be sold by said States, and the proceeds thereof applied to the uses and the purposes prescribed in this act, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever: Provided, That in no case shall any State to which land scrip may thus be issued, be allowed to locate the same within the limits of any other State, but their assignees may thus locate said land scrip upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States, subject to private entry.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the expenses of management and superintendence of said lands, previous to their sales, and all expenses incurred in the management and disbursement of the moneys which may be received therefrom, shall be paid by the States to which they may belong out of the treasury of said States, so that the entire proceeds of the sale of said lands shall be applied without any diminution whatever to the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all moneys derived from the sale of the lands aforesaid by the States to which the lands are apportioned, and from the sales of land scrip heretofore provided for, shall be invested in stocks of the United States, or of the States, or some other safe stocks, yielding not less than five per centum upon the par value of said stocks; and that the moneys so invested shall constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which shall remain forever undiminished (except so far as may be provided in section fifth of this act,) and the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated, by each State which may take and claim the benefit of this act, to the endowment, support, and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific or classical studies, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the grant of land and land scrip hereby authorized shall be made on the following conditions, to which, as well as to the provisions hereinafter contained, the previous assent of the several States shall be signified by legislative acts:

First. If any portion of the fund invested, as provided by the foregoing section, or any portion of the interest thereon, shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by the State to which it belongs, so that the capital of the fund shall remain forever undiminished; and the annual interest shall be regularly applied, without diminution, to the purposes mentioned in the fourth section of this act, except that a sum, not exceeding ten per centum upon the amount received by any State under the provisions of this act, may be expended for the purchase of lands for sites or experimental farms, whenever authorized by the respective Legislatures of said States.

Second. No portion of said fund, nor the interest thereon, shall be applied, directly or indirectly, under any pretense whatever, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair, of any building or buildings.

Third. Any State which may take and claim the benefit of the provisions of this act shall provide, within five years, at least not less than one college, as described in the fourth section of this act, or the grant to such State shall cease; and said State shall be bound to pay the United States the amount received of any lands previously sold, and that the title to purchasers under the State shall be valid.

Fourth. An annual report shall be made regarding the progress of each college, recording any improvements and experiments made, with their cost and results, and such other matters as may be supposed useful—one copy of which shall be transmitted by mail free, by each, to all the other colleges which may be endowed under the provisions of this act, and to the Smithsonian Institution, and the agricultural department of the Patent Office, at Washington.

Fifth. When lands shall be selected from those which have been raised to double the minimum price, in consequence of railroad grants, they shall be computed to the State so selecting at double the quantity.

Mr. TRIPPE. If the motion to lay on the table be voted down, will the next question be upon the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay on the table fails, the question will recur on seconding the call for the previous question.

The question was taken on Mr. COBB's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingham, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Burnett, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Garrett, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Scales, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Warren, Watkins, Winslow, and John V. Wright—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Leach, Leidy, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potte, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollcoffer—114.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll, Mr. JACKSON stated that Mr. LAMAR was still confined to his room by indisposition, and had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, upon all questions relating to Kansas and Minnesota.

Mr. LETCHER stated that Mr. POWELL had been called home, and had paired off with Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois; and that Mr. HOPKINS was still confined to his room by indisposition.

WASHINGTON AUXILIARY GUARD.

Mr. BURNETT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.
Mr. BURNETT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the pending question to be upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], to lay upon the table an act (S. No. 232) to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the condition of the bill now before the House? I know the previous question has been ordered, but how are the amendments to be voted on? Are we first to vote upon the substitute of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODD]; and if that should be voted down, then upon the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The adoption of the substitute by the committee let fall all the amendments to the original bill. If the motion to lay upon the table be voted down, the question will be first upon agreeing to the substitute of the gentleman from New York. If that shall be voted down, the question will be upon ordering the Senate bill, without amendment, to a third reading.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. At the suggestion of friends, I withdraw for the present the motion to lay the bill upon the table, so that a vote may be taken upon the substitute of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEITER. I renew the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Billingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Jewett, Kellogg, Knapp, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Potter, Potte, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Spinner, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wood, and Zollcoffer—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Case, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Burton Craig, Curry, Davidson, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Florence, Foster, Garrett, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Hatch, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kilgore, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Walbridge, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—97.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. CURTIS stated that he was opposed to the bill in all its forms, and had paired off with Mr. FAULKNER.

Mr. COBB stated that he voted "ay," because, as the previous question had been ordered, there would be no opportunity to amend the bill, but they must take it just as it stood.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the following substitute [Mr. Dobb's] for the Senate bill, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

A bill to establish an efficient police for the city of Washington.

That the boards of the City Council of the city of Washington shall forthwith appoint commissioners of election, according to the charter of said city, who shall, on four days' notice after the passage of this act, hold an election for the choice of four commissioners of police, in manner following: At such election each voter of the city of Washington shall vote for two persons for commissioners of police, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than two names; and the four persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and two of them shall hold their offices for two years, and two of them for one year from the day of said election; and the person having the greatest and the person having the lowest number of votes shall be the two to go out of office at the end of one year; and if any two have the same and the highest or the lowest number of votes, such two shall draw lots between themselves to determine which shall go out of office; and there shall be an election on the same day every succeeding year, held as above directed, for two commissioners of police, at which each voter shall vote for one person only, and no ballot shall be counted that contains more than one name; and the two persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected, and shall hold their office for two years from the day of their election; and the said four commissioners of police shall constitute a board, to any act or resolution whereof the assent of three of said board, entered on its minutes in writing, shall be necessary; and said board is hereby invested with power to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, the police force hereinafter provided for, and also to appoint and remove, at their pleasure, such police force as now exists under the authority of the boards of the City Council, or may be hereafter established; and the said board shall make rules and regulations for the government of all the said police authorized by this act or by the said boards of the said City Councils.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be established a police force for the protection of public and private property, and for the enforcement of the police regulations of the city of Washington, to consist of a chief at an annual salary of $2,000, one captain at an annual salary of $1,200, four lieutenants at an annual salary of $800 each, and one hundred men at an annual salary of $600 each, to be paid monthly.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the guard hereby established shall be divided by the chief into squads of convenient size; and the chief is authorized and empowered to establish guard-houses at such points in the city of Washington as he may designate, subject, however, to the approval of the commissioners aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to each commissioner chosen and serving under this act an annual salary of $1,000.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated annually as a contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of police, to carry out the purposes of this act in the suppression of crime and detection of criminals in the city of Washington.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each member of the guard shall be required to wear a uniform dress at all hours when on duty, and on his hat, or cap, or breast, such number as may be assigned him. The captains and lieutenants, at all times, day and night, shall wear an official badge; and said uniforms, badges, and numbers, hereby required to be worn, shall also be prescribed by the chief, and shall be made public in the newspapers in Washington for one month after first prescribed, and shall not thereafter be changed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That each member of the police force, before entering upon the discharge of his duty, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully and impartially discharge his duties as such.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, authorizing or relating to the employment of an auxiliary watch, or guard, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. I understand that, if the substitute of the gentleman from New York should be voted down, the House would then be brought to a vote upon the Senate bill, just as it came from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Without any amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. What will be the precise question if the substitute shall be voted down?

The SPEAKER. The only remaining proposition for the House to vote upon will be the Senate bill as it came from the Senate, without amendment. The question will be upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. What has become of the House bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the House bill is in Committee of the Whole. It was not reported to the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I demand the yeas and nays upon the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 90, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Zollicoffer—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, Leitcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, and John V. Wright—101.

So the substitute was rejected.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. READY stated that he had paired off upon this vote with his colleague, Mr. SMITH.

Mr. HARLAN stated that Mr. KELSEY was confined to his room by illness.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, Burton Craig, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leitcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Miles, Millson, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—79.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

PURCHASE OF LAND FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by this House to investigate the facts and circumstances connected with the purchase of Willett's Point, in the State of New York, by the Government of the United States, be directed to extend their investigations to the facts and circumstances connected with the purchase of Clark's Point, in New Bedford, in the State of Massachusetts, by the same.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is House bill No. 2, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, on which the previous question has been called.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SEWARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be a bill (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to; and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that, after the long discussion which we have heard here on this floor in regard to the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I feel no small degree of embarrassment in approaching that subject. Indeed, after having refrained from entering the chase while the game was fairly afoot, I should not, at this late hour, have sought the indulgence of the committee, were it not for the strange and extraordinary speech of my colleague from the fifth district, [Mr. GILMER,] which it is now my purpose to review in the brief hour which is allotted to me on this occasion. In doing this, I desire to premise that I have no complaint to make on account of my colleague's votes against the admission of Kansas, although I believe they are in direct opposition to the rights and interests of his constituents and mine, and tending to the perpetration of an act by this Congress which is characterized by the leading Know Nothing organ in North Carolina as an "unparalleled outrage." That, however, is a matter between him and the people who sent him here to uphold their rights and defend their honor; and they, I doubt not, will in good time pass upon his conduct. But, sir, it is my right to examine with all freedom, as I trust I shall with equal fairness, the sentiments he has expressed, and the positions he has assumed, and to repel in a proper spirit the attack he has thought proper to make upon the Executive and the Democratic party.

I regretted, Mr. Chairman, to hear the rebuke administered by my colleague to those southern gentlemen who have spoken, perhaps with intemperate heat, of the many aggressions of the North upon the rights of the South. It is true that in the outset of his remarks he disapproved the violent assaults of northern members also; but, throughout his whole speech, there seemed to be a disposition to ignore the wrongs we have suffered. Not one word to indicate that we are the party assailed, and that the Black Republicans have no just ground upon which they can base the malignant attacks they are constantly making upon us. Sir, I do not myself approve the tone and temper which some gentlemen on this side have indulged in. I do not admire that sort of warfare; and, with due deference to them, I do not think southern gentlemen ought to participate in it; but when we remember that for many years the South has been assailed in her dearest interests; her constitutional rights disregarded; laws passed in accordance with a plain and unequivocal provision of the Constitution, designed to protect her in her slave property, nullified and trampled under foot in several of the northern States; efforts made by a powerful party, sectional in its character, and led on by talented, sagacious, and unscrupulous men, to deprive the South of her just participation in the administration of the Federal Government, and openly declaring it to be their settled determination to prevent the admission of any more slave States; when we have been compelled to sit here, day after day, week after week, and month after month, and hear the slaveholding States held up to the scorn and detestation of the world, our people stigmatized as infidels, vilified and abused in the coarsest billingsgate to be found in the Black Republican vocabulary, by the fanatics who crowded around my colleague, and cordially congratulated him, at the conclusion of his speech; is it strange, is it to be wondered at, that southern members of this House, thus goaded, should be found sometimes yielding to the honest impulses of their nature, and denouncing, in severe but just terms, those common disturbers of the public peace, and traitors to the Constitution and the Union? Mr. Chairman, unlike my colleague, I can forgive something to the spirit of patriotism; and while I may not approve the intemperate speeches sometimes made on this side, I cannot but contrast their course with that of my colleague; while I admire the zeal and devotion to the rights of their own section which prompt them, especially as I feel and know that it is only by an uncompromising adherence to their rights that the Union can be maintained.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to put an interrogatory to him?

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any questions.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is a very brief one. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman knows that his colleague [Mr. GILMER] is absent, having paired off with Mr. CARUTHERS, who is in bad health; and that he is not present to respond to his remarks?

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I am aware of that fact; and some of my friends know that I sought earnestly to obtain the floor while my colleague was still here. And I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio, that no word which I utter here, will I refuse to proclaim in the face of my colleague here, or elsewhere.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not question that, at all.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. What I say here will be published, and will reach the eye of my colleague. I will therefore be doing him no sort of injustice. I would have preferred that my colleague were present. But—he having discharged his Parthian arrows—because he is now absent, I cannot consent to lose the first opportunity which presents itself, and no doubt the only one I shall have, to make my reply. The poison which he has emitted is, even now, being circulated in North Carolina; and I am unwilling it should be administered without the antidote I intend to prescribe.

Mr. Chairman, if I have correctly comprehended the speech of my colleague, he bases his opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, in other words, to her admission as a slave State, upon three points of objection: first, that the Green amendment affirms the right of a majority of the people to change the constitution at any time they please; and that, by the establishment of that principle, slavery may be excluded whenever a majority of the people choose; second, that the population of Kansas is not sufficient to entitle her to admission; and, third, that the constitution framed at Lecompton is not the will of the people of that Territory. I propose to examine these several points.

Now, sir, with all due respect for my colleague, I say the Green amendment affirms no such thing. Here is the amendment, word for word, and letter for letter:

"And that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, and abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

What is a fair construction of that amendment? Simply that we do not intend by the act of admission to deny, as we do not affirm, any right of the people of Kansas, as asserted in their constitution, to alter or abolish their form of government; at the same time it unequivocally declares that Congress has no right to intervene otherwise than to see that the constitution presented is republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. This question requires no argument—it admits of none—the language is so plain that to state it is to explain it. Now I am free to confess that I preferred the bill without that amendment; not for the reasons assigned by my colleague, but because the premises amount, in my judgment, to a truism which no man who understands the true theory of our system of government would ever think of controverting. I therefore voted to strike it out. Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States might solemnly resolve, every legislative day in the year, from now "till the crack o' doom," that the people of North Carolina had, or had not, the right to alter, amend, or abolish their present form of government to suit themselves; but, sir, would their rights be thereby affected one way or another? Not at all; not at all—every State having the unquestionable right to alter or amend her constitution in her own way.

But suppose my colleague's construction of the Green amendment is correct; admit, for the sake of the argument, that it does affirm the right of the people of Kansas to alter their constitution at any time they please, regardless of the restrictions in the instrument itself: does my colleague repudiate the principle? If he does, I call upon him to say how, as a member of the Senate of North Carolina, solemnly sworn to support the constitution of that State, he voted for the proposition of Governor Graham to call a convention to amend the constitution, in a manner totally different from that prescribed in that instrument? Then let my colleague yield his objection to the Green amendment, or acknowledge that he is but availing himself of that "policy," which, to use his own language, "is practiced in our little electioneering scuffles in our country, and which ought not to obtain in the Congress of our nation."

Having listened to the gentleman's denunciation and ridicule of the Green amendment in his speech of the 30th March, who, Mr. Chairman, could have supposed that in two days thereafter he would have been found voting for it! And yet he did! On the 30th of March it was wrong in principle, and rendered the Senate bill worthless to the South; on the 1st of April, only two days, I repeat, after he denounced and ridiculed it, when the gentleman from Mississippi moved to strike it out, he voted with the whole body of the Opposition against the motion! Voted against striking out an amendment which, in his opinion, so completely emasculated the bill that it was deprived of every power of generating a single principle of the least value to the South?

But the gentleman may say that he voted against the Green amendment in order to save, if possible, the House bill. I do not by any means admit that he can thereby find a sufficient justification of his vote; but I am willing, for the sake of the argument only, to give him the benefit of that position; and now let us see whether he is justifiable in taking the Crittenden amendment in preference to the Senate bill. The gentleman, in the outset of his remarks, charged the Democratic party with practicing the unwise policy of encouraging foreign immigration into the new States and Territories, by granting to aliens not naturalized the right of suffrage, and by making them eligible to offices of emolument and honor; and he held up this policy as one that ought to receive the unqualified condemnation of the people, especially of the South, as it was injurious to her best interests. Now let us compare the two bills in reference to these questions which my colleague thinks so vitally important. The Senate bill, which he condemns and voted against, proposes to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, which, in the first section of the eighth article, defines the right of suffrage as follows:

"Sec. 1. Every male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State one year, and in the county, city, or town in which he may offer to vote, three months next preceding any election, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

Here, then, is a principle which he deems of vital importance to the South fully secured in this constitution. The Crittenden bill, which he voted for, proposes to refer the whole subject back to the people of Kansas. My colleague says the majority in that Territory is opposed to the Lecompton constitution; of course, then, the Black Republicans would frame and establish a new constitution, in case he should succeed in crushing out Lecompton; and what kind of provisions, think you, that constitution would contain in reference to this question, which, he tells us, deserves the serious consideration of the South? Why, sir, the latest intelligence from that Territory, fruitful of constitutions as Niobe of tears, represents that the Black Republicans, anticipating the action of my colleague in the rejection of the slaveholding and anti-alien-suffrage constitution of Lecompton, have already made another, which, as we are informed, not only confers this inestimable privilege upon foreigners, but upon negroes also! Now, what becomes of my colleague's Know-Nothing principle in reference to this subject? It has clearly been sacrificed to something; I leave him to say what.

The Lecompton constitution contains the following provisions in regard to eligibility to office, (article four:—)

"Sec. 3. The Governor shall be at least thirty years of age, shall have been a citizen of the United States for twenty years, shall have resided in this State at least five years next preceding the day of his election," &c.

"Sec. 17. A Lieutenant Governor shall be elected at the same time and for the same term as the Governor, and his qualifications, and the manner of his election, shall be the same in all respects."

Here, then, is another principle which he commends to southern politicians. Now, I leave it to my colleague to say whether, judging from what we have already heard of the constitution lately framed at Leavenworth, he has any good reason to expect that any other which may be adopted, should he succeed in defeating the Lecompton constitution, will be likely to come up to his standard of excellence in this regard? In reference to this question, however, I am inclined to think, notwithstanding what my colleague has said upon this subject, he does not, after all, look upon it as anything more than that sort of "policy practiced in our little electioneering scuffles in our country;" for I well remember that when he was a member of the North Carolina State Senate, he recommended a regular, full-blooded Milesian, one Pat McGowan, for a Federal office under General Pierce, thereby proving very clearly that, in reference to this principle which he so seriously commended to southern politicians—and the same may be said of his opposition to the Green amendment also—he is, if he will permit me, by way of illustration, to use one of the elegant anecdotes with which he embellished his speech, "a sorter so, and a sorter not so, and rather more a sorter so than a sorter not so." He commends the principle of excluding foreigners from office, and gives the influence of his name toward procuring office for one of that class. He denounces the Green amendment in his speech, and then votes for it!

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another of my colleague's long cherished principles which I think he sacrificed to his hostility to Lecompton. For many years he and his party in North Carolina, have contended that the public lands were wastefully squandered upon the new States, to the great prejudice of North Carolina and the other old States. This matter has been presented to the people of our "beloved South" (to borrow the gentleman's term of endearment,) and enforced with an array of statistical tables that would appal old Mr. Daboll himself. With the most eloquent and disinterested appeals the people of North Carolina have been urged to send to Congress gentlemen of my colleague's political faith, who would be sure to guard the public domain, and see that they got "their full share." Now, sir, how has my colleague proposed to secure for North Carolina her just and rightful interest in the immense public domain in Kansas, amounting, as I think, to about eighty millions of acres?

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchaser and grantee thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever, upon them or other property of the United States within the limits of said State."

Here is the just and rightful claim of the Government of the United States to all the unsold lands in Kansas, fairly "nominated in the bond," and thereby secured for the benefit of North Carolina and all the other States alike. My colleague voted against this just and necessary measure of security; and while he told us that the President is unworthy of our confidence, he nevertheless proposed not only to depart from the constitutional mode of admitting Kansas by act of Congress, but to confer upon the President the power to bring her into the Confederacy by his own mere ipse dixit, so soon as she should offer to him a constitution, regardless of its provisions. Now, sir, suppose that the people of Kansas (the bill for which my colleague voted having become a law, and the President invested with that stupendous power) should reject the Lecompton constitution, and my colleague takes the ground that they would, for he voted against the Senate bill because he says it is not the will of her people, and then proceed to frame another constitution, in which they solemnly declare that the entire public domain within her borders belongs of right to the sovereign State of Kansas, and can be used for her benefit alone—that constitution being presented to the President he will be compelled, in obedience to the Crittenden bill, to induct her into the Confederacy: would my colleague, as a lawyer, undertake to prosecute the claim of North Carolina to her just and equal share of those public lands? Sir, how would he bring his action, and in what court, pray?

Another objection to the admission of Kansas (under the Lecompton constitution, mark you) is the insufficiency of her population. To this objection I shall devote but few words. Admitting very fully the general principle that a State ought to have the number of population fixed by the law for the time being as the representative ratio, I am not prepared to deny that, under peculiar circumstances, acting under a sound discretion, Congress may depart from the rule. In the present case, however, it appears to be admitted on all sides, so far as I know, that Kansas has the requisite population. General Pierce seems to have been of that opinion as far back as the last Congress. Mr. Buchanan is evidently of the same mind. It is not controverted either in the report of Judge DOUGLAS, or that of Messrs. COLLAMER and WADE, made during the present session; and I know of no one, except my colleague, who has raised the question. So far as he is concerned, I shall dispose of it in a very few words. My colleague offered a bill himself for the admission of Kansas; and I have only to say, that if the population of that Territory be sufficient to justify her admission under his bill, it strikes my poor judgment that it is equally sufficient to justify her admission under the Senate bill.

The other point made by the gentleman from North Carolina is, that the Lecompton constitution is not the will of the people of Kansas. In order that I may be properly understood in what I shall say upon this point, it is necessary that I should refer, as briefly as may be, to the legislation of Congress in reference to slavery, and to the events which have transpired in Kansas. On the application of Missouri to become one of the States of the Union, she was refused admission on account of the slavery feature of her constitution. In vain did southern members, and the conservative portion of northern men, urge that Congress had no right to reject a State for any other reason save that her constitution was anti-republican. A bitter contest arose, which excited serious apprehensions on account of the safety of the Union. At length the proposition contained in the eighth section of the act of March 6, 1820, by which slavery was to be excluded from all the territory of the United States north of the line of 36° 30', was offered, and, in an evil hour, accepted by the South. This was to be a compact, a bond of peace! and yet, in the very next year after its adoption, it was set at defiance by the North. Again and again, subsequently, when the South applied for the admission of new slave States, this sacred compact, as it has been called, and for which my colleague has so much veneration, was utterly repudiated by that section which had forced it upon the South as a measure of peace and harmony. At length, after the conclusion of the war with Mexico, by which we acquired extensive territory, some of which was south of the Missouri restriction line, in utter violation of that compromise, and in total disregard of every principle of justice, an effort was made to exclude us from a just and equal participation in the fruits of that glorious war by the application of the Wilmot proviso, thereby intending to exclude us from all that vast territory, acquired, as it had been, by a common expenditure of blood and treasure, of which—and I do the North no injustice when I say it—the South contributed her full share.

At this crisis the South agreed to run the Missouri line through to the Pacific, and thus forever settle the dispute: this offer was persistently rejected by the very men who have since proclaimed that compromise a sacred compact, binding as the Constitution itself! Denied even this small concession to our just demands, nothing was left the South but to fall back upon her constitutional rights, and to insist upon equal privileges in all the Territories. After a struggle which shook this Republic to its deep foundations, the question was disposed of, so far as Utah and New Mexico were concerned, by the legislation of 1850. I shall not stop here to inquire into the wisdom of the compromise measures of that year. I may say, however, en passant, that according to my honest opinion, the South fared in this as she had done in every other compromise to which she has given her assent. Peace, or rather a truce, was obtained for a brief period, until at length Congress undertook to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, in 1854. In the mean time both the political parties then struggling for power, adopted in their platforms the principle of non-intervention asserted in the legislation of 1850. In order fairly to carry out that principle in organizing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, it became necessary to repeal the Missouri restriction, which excluded slave property from those Territories. The time had now come when the soundness of the two parties, and their fidelity to the principles asserted in 1850, and affirmed in both party platforms in 1852, were to be tested. The result proved that the northern wing of the Whig party, which in the days of its great leaders, Clay and Webster, had always given evidence of the possession of some conservative principle, was utterly unsound, and it soon fell into that grave to which it was so justly consigned. The Democratic party, aided by most of the southern Whigs, repealed the Missouri restriction, and firmly established the principle of non-intervention.

The Territory of Kansas was thus opened up for settlement by southern as well as northern men, and the Black Republican party, which had crawled forth from the ruins of the Whig party, like a huge serpent from among the fallen columns of some magnificent temple, soon found that if left to herself, and emigration permitted to flow through its natural channels, Kansas would become a slaveholding State. An emigrant aid society, with a capital of $5,000,000, was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts, whose object was the settlement of Kansas with a free-soil population, to wrest that fine Territory from the South, and thereby prevent another slave State from being admitted into the Union. Maddened by the pious eloquence of such fanatics as Parker and Bercher, and inflamed by the vehement declamation of the Black Republican leaders, thousands of Kansas-shriekers, armed with rifles and revolvers, rushed into the Territory.

The laws passed by the Territorial Legislature were repudiated; the regularly constituted authorities set at defiance; and a spurious government set up by these traitors, who placed themselves in a state of open rebellion. Sir, is this picture overdrawn? Will my colleague deny that the Free-Soil party in Kansas, whose violated rights he so feelingly deplores, was in a state of rebellion against the government established by Congress? We have the official evidence of Governor Walker to sustain the declaration.

In his proclamation to the people of Kansas, after making most earnest appeals, he says:

"A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country.

"Permit me to call your attention, as still claiming to be citizens of the United States, to the results of your revolutionary proceedings. You are inaugurating rebellion and revolution; you are disregarding the laws of Congress and of the territorial government, and defying their authority; you are conspiring to overthrow the Government of the United States in this Territory. Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason."

He further says:

"Under these circumstances, you have proceeded to establish a government for the city of Lawrence in direct defiance of the territorial government, and denying its existence and authority. You have imposed upon all those officers the duty of taking an oath to support this so-called State constitution; thus distinctly superseding, so far as in your power, the territorial government created by the Congress of the United States."

Governor Walker, in his letter to the Secretary of State of July 20, 1857, says:

"There is imminent danger, unless the territorial government is sustained by a large body of the troops of the United States, that, for all practical purposes, it will be overthrown, or reduced to a condition of absolute imbecility. I am constrained, therefore, to inform you that, with a view to sustain the authority of the United States in this Territory, it is undeniably necessary that we should have immediately stationed at Fort Leavenworth at least two thousand regular troops, and that General Harney should be retained in command."

If this evidence is not complete, I will add that which my colleague cannot gainsay. In his issue of the 10th February, 1858, the editor of the Raleigh Register says:

"The unreasonable, unjust, and treasonable course of the Free Soilers and Topoka men of Kansas is properly set forth by the President, who, when he denounces them as rebels, uses the word best calculated properly to characterize their conduct. These men have committed the very offense in Kansas which the Mormons perpetrated in Utah. They have defied the authority of the laws and the Government, and attempted to set up an imperium in imperio in Kansas. To say, therefore, that the howlings of these traitors and rebels should cause the rejection of the Lecompton constitution is to countenance lawlessness and reward treason."

Discord then reigned in that unhappy Territory, and it became evident that the only mode by which quiet could be gained, and peace restored to Kansas and the country, was by procuring her admission as a State into the Confederacy. An act was therefore passed by the Territorial Legislature to provide for taking the sense of the people as to the expediency of calling a convention to frame a constitution. At a regular and fair election thus legally authorized, the people voted with great unanimity in favor of a convention. The next Legislature passed an act to provide for the election of delegates to a convention to be composed of sixty members, who were to be apportioned among the several counties of the Territory in proportion to their population, which was to be ascertained by taking a census. This act was vetoed by Governor Geary because it contained no provision for submitting the constitution to the people for ratification or rejection. The Legislature then passed it over the Governor's veto by a two-thirds vote, and it thus became a law.

The convention thus elected assembled at Lecompton, and framed the constitution under which Kansas now asks for admission into the Union. My colleague says it does not embody the will of the people, and he therefore is against it. His language is:

"I must say that when I hear it asserted here, and everywhere, and the proofs strongly tending to show that the government of Kansas was, in the first instance, ruthlessly snatched from the people, unconstitutional test oaths applied, by which the minority, who by fraud obtained the control of the government, and by which the majority were kept from participating in the government; when I am told, and the proof tends that way, that not more than one half of the counties of the Territory were permitted to be represented in the convention, I doubt the propriety of supporting the constitution framed thus."

Government of Kansas ruthlessly snatched from the people! test oaths! majority kept from a participation in the government! not more than half the counties permitted to be represented in the convention! These are the charges which have been made and so often repeated through all the different moods and tenses by the whole Black Republican school, and now gravely affirmed by my colleague. Sir, if the name of the senior member from Ohio had been affixed to the above extract instead of my colleague, would any one have doubted its authenticity? Says Mr. GIDDINGS: "Usurpations and brute force were resorted to for the purpose of extending and supporting slavery." Says Mr. WILSON: "In this contest, slavery has startled the nation by a series of acts of violence and frauds," &c. So said Mr. SEWARD, Mr. HARLAN, and other Black Republicans who have spoken upon the question. These are the authorities, I suppose, upon which my colleague relies to sustain his charges against the pro-slavery party in Kansas! Why, sir, this cry was commenced in 1854, immediately after the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, and it has been kept up ever since. Sorry am I that southern men are now found to join in it. That the pro-slavery men have committed no wrongs, I am far from saying. Assailed, as they have been, by lawless bands of Abolitionists, who boasted of their intention, first to abolitionize Kansas and then overrun Missouri, they would have been more or less than men had they borne themselves faultless in such a contest. But, sir, can the charges against the pro-slavery party, made by my colleague, be sustained by any other authority than that to which I have alluded?

I have already proved by Governor Walker, as well as by the Raleigh Register, that these organizers were in a state of rebellion and resistance to the laws. That they refused to register their names and establish for themselves such form of government as they desired, the evidence is equally abundant. In the affidavit of George Wilson, contained in Senate report by Mr. GREEN, he says:

"At the time when the census was taken under the law providing for the Lecompton convention, I was the acting judge of probate for Anderson county, Kansas, and am aware of the fact that the two wings of the free-State party of that county, composed of more moderate Free-Soilers and the adherents of Lane, threatened the life of any who should attempt to take the legal census; and I can say, under oath, that the life of any one making the attempt to execute the law in that particular was in danger, and the foregoing threats were the cause which prevented the taking of the census in Anderson county within the prescribed time."

"In regard to Passmore Williams, judge of probate for Allen county, members of the so-called free-State party stated to me in person that if he attempted to execute the law, and did not leave, they would kill him; and I know the fact that he did not execute the law, and left the county because he believed his life in danger. Mr. Williams is from Illinois, and is a free-State man, but belongs to the Democratic party."

"In regard to Esquire Vocun, judge of probate for Franklin county, he left the county and the Territory on account of losing his negro property, and having his life menaced. The office being vacant, the Legislature which passed the census law appointed a new judge of probate and other officers, who refused to serve, alleging as a reason, that they were afraid so doing would cost them their lives. Consequently, no census was taken, and no legal election held."

If my time would admit, I might adduce further proof of the same import.

But my colleague says test oaths were imposed. One of them was an oath binding officers to support the Constitution of the United States, the organic act, and the fugitive slave law; this, at least, was not, to my mind, so very monstrous—but they were all repealed before the constitutional convention was called, so that no complaint could exist on that score. But these poor innocents, these meek and orderly Black Republicans, were disfranchised in half the counties in the Territory! Sir, has my colleague been so intent in his labor of love in hunting up charges against the pro-slavery party in Kansas, that he has not had time to look at the official evidence? I have already shown that the Free-Soilers refused to register their names, and actually drove off the officers and would not permit them to discharge their duties. It is well known that several of the counties alluded to had no population; in others there were not more than ten or fifteen voters each; in all of them together the Free-Soilers could only drum up about fourteen hundred at the election on the 14th of January, although they had everything their own way—the pro-slavery men denying the validity of the election and taking no part in it. These people were not disfranchised and denied a participation in the territorial government and formation of the constitution. Although urged by every consideration that could animate patriots and influence good citizens, they factiously refused to have part or lot in the matter.

Now, I have shown by evidence which my colleague cannot impugn, that these people are deprived of no rights; that they themselves refused to participate in the elections, and have no right to come here now and claim to take advantage of their own wrong. If they were in the majority, they should have resorted to the peaceful and republican method of the ballot-box to redress themselves. If, as is most likely, they were in the minority, they had none to be redressed.

Mr. Chairman, the constitution of Kansas was framed in a regular manner, and in strict accordance with all the requirements and forms of law; but my colleague would have it referred to the people for ratification or rejection. Is it necessary to submit a constitution in order to ascertain the will of the people, and make it binding? Then the constitution of North Carolina has no validity, for it was not submitted! Then the constitutions of all the rest of the original thirteen States, except one, are of no binding force; for I believe Massachusetts is the only one which submitted her constitution!

This doctrine would, moreover, remand to a territorial form of government thirteen out of the eighteen new States that have been admitted; for five only of them all have submitted their constitutions. Every one knows that the constitution of the United States was never so submitted; and so far as North Carolina is concerned, and I think the same was the case in all the rest, even the delegates to the convention which framed that instrument were not elected by the people, but by the Legislatures.

But, sir, I want to know of my colleague how long he has advocated the doctrine that it was the duty of the Lecompton convention to submit the result of their labors to the people? In the late canvass between my competitor and myself, in the first district, he took open ground against submission, and denounced the Administration for favoring it through Governor Walker. He declared that it would be a flagrant wrong to the South. I said then, as I repeat now, that the submission or refusal to submit the constitution of Kansas was a question with which neither the President, nor Governor Walker, nor my opponent, nor myself, nor any one else outside of Kansas, had anything to do; that it belonged solely to the convention, which had a complete right to submit it or not, as, in its wisdom, it might see fit. That convention did not choose to submit it to the people, and who has a right to complain? Surely the people of North Carolina have not, nor do they.

In order, however, to remove every ground of complaint, the slavery article, which was the only disturbing question, was referred to them for ratification or rejection. A fair election was held, and a majority of five thousand six hundred and fifty-seven votes was polled in favor of slavery; but my capacious colleague contends that there were fraudulent votes given. Well, I do not doubt that there were; but has he, or any of his coadjutors, undertaken to prove that there were five thousand six hundred and fifty-seven fraudulent votes? By no means; no one has ever made any such pretension. Until that shall be done, this constitution must stand as the will of the people of Kansas, unless amended or abolished according to the forms of law. It stands vindicated by a principle of constitutional law so firmly fixed in the hearts of the American people, that no battery of logic and no fund of anecdote that my colleague can bring against it can move it from its base.

But my indefatigable colleague says that a majority of ten thousand votes were cast against the Lecompton constitution at the election on the 4th of January, and that General Cass, as Secretary of State, acknowledged the validity of that election. Why, sir, we all know that the convention which framed the constitution provided for an election to be held on the 21st of December, to take the sense of the people upon the constitution, or rather the slavery clause. I have already stated the result of that election; it is idle—without meaning any disrespect to my colleague—it is absurd, to say that the Territorial Legislature had power to order another election. The Democratic party in Kansas so considered the matter, and took no part in it. No vote cast at that election can affect the validity of the Lecompton constitution. But my colleague says that General Cass, as Secretary of State, acknowledged the validity of that election. Sir, I am amazed that my colleague should be so reckless in his zeal to defeat the Lecompton constitution as to make assertions that are so easily disproved by the record. In his letter of the 11th of December, 1857, to Secretary Denver, General Cass says:

"It is proper to add, that no action of the Territorial Legislature about to meet, can interfere with the elections of the 21st of December and the 26th of January, in the mode and manner prescribed by the constitutional convention."

Why, then, should not Kansas be admitted under it, this whole subject localized, and she left to manage her own affairs in her own way? Twice have Jim Lane and his myrmidons had an opportunity of voting upon this question. Will my colleague still insist upon giving them a third chance? He speaks of bringing two Jim Lanes here as Senators; if the Black Republicans have the Legislature, two Senators of that stripe will be sent any way, it may be. My colleague is not satisfied with that; his action, if successful, would abolish a constitution which has made Kansas at this moment, to use the language of the President, "as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina," and with equal certainty he would make it a free State, provided he is right in saying the Abolitionists are in the majority. Says Mr. BURLINGAME, in his late speech in the House:

"I will vote for it [Citizens bill] because I think that it will make Kansas a free State. The Administration says it is a slave Territory to-day—the Lecompton constitution makes it a slave State. I feel that the Lecompton constitution, without this substitute, would pass in its naked form, and that Kansas would be a slave State under it."

Sir, does not my colleague see and know that the object of the Black Republicans is to give the Abolitionists in Kansas another chance, and to keep alive this question, which is the very ailment upon which the monster Black Republicanism feeds, to aid them in bringing into this Hall a Black Republican majority in the next Congress, and so strengthen themselves for the mighty struggle they are to make in 1860? And this "unparalleled outrage," as the Raleigh Register styles it, is to be perpetrated by the agency, in part, of southern Representatives. The member from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLINGAME] tells us the alliance has been formed, and he, a prophet of evil, vauntingly predicts the result! What is it? I will let him speak for himself. Listen:

"I also felt proud to hear the speech of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL]. I was glad to hear their conferees on this floor, Messrs. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, GILMER of North Carolina, RICHARD and HARRIS of Maryland, and DAVIS, with his surpassing eloquence, worthy of the best days of Pinckney and Wirt; and I also express my gratitude to Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, who has labored so long to secure this union of patriots men. I owe it to these men, and to myself, to say that I do not agree with them on the subject of slavery, and I know that they do not agree with me. Neither do I agree with the Douglas men; I take what I think is a higher position. I hold to the power of Congress over the Territories; they do not. But while I oppose the Lecompton Constitution for one reason, and while the Douglas Democrats oppose it for another, the South Americans may oppose it for still another. God knows we have all cause of war against it, and against the Administration. And we have come together here as a unit, not by any preconcert, not by any trade among leaders, but by the spontaneous convictions of our own honest minds. I trust that this may be an omen of what may happen in the future."

Here we have the triple alliance of Black Republicans, Douglas Democrats, and southern Know Nothings! Now for the results of that unnatural combination! Addressing himself to the thirty patriotic and fearless Democrats who have dared to do their duty here by standing up for the constitutional rights of the South, he says:

"They will ask you why the Army of the United States have shot down American citizens in the streets of Washington, and why it was held in terrorem over the people of Kansas so long. And they will ask you, dough-faces of the North, why you sat still in your seats, and allowed men to call your constituents, because they toiled, mud-sills and slaves? You will have to answer all these things. You cannot do it, and we shall beat you like a threshing floor. We shall hereafter have a majority in this House. We shall strengthen ourselves in the Senate, and we are to-day filling all the land with the portents of your general doom in 1860."

Sir, the thing is plain to the dullest eye! It stands out gross and palpable, and no man can fail to see it who is not blinded by his prejudices against the Democratic party, that party upon which the hopes and the destinies of this mighty Republic hang! Witness the efforts they are making to defeat the Lecompton constitution; look at the solid front they present here whenever a vote is taken on the question; read their speeches and listen to the shouts of exultation that have already been sent forth from their party press in anticipation of the defeat of this great measure! I quote from the Albany Evening Journal:

"The vote in the House of Representatives virtually repudiating the scheme of villainy inaugurated by the border ruffians of Missouri, with the connivance of President Pierce, and culminating in the Lecompton fraud under Buchanan, gives hope and courage to those who began to despair of the Republic. Conscience seems about to resume its reign in a region from whence it never should have been banished. For ten long years, nearly, the moral sentiment of the nation has been deteriorating. The sense of justice, the love of liberty, and allegiance to God, have all been waning. Neighboring nations have been robbed, men have been reduced to slaves within the shadow of Faneuil Hall, and the higher law has been denounced and derided. Infidels to humanity, scoffers at the law of God, and recreants to freedom, have revelled in power and plunder. But a day of reckoning is at hand. The nation's heart throbs with new feelings. Hope is giving place to despair, and freedom is asserting its claims to reverence. Everywhere at the North, and even in the South, we see that the spirit of liberty (Abolitionism) is working among the people, and the recent vote in Congress is but an index of that feeling. This awakening of the conscience of the people should inspire us with new zeal, and lead to redoubled efforts in the cause of freedom (Black Republicanism.) The overthrow of the slave power is approaching."

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I have not said all that I desired to in reply to my colleague. My time will not admit. I am admonished that it has already nearly expired; but I cannot resume my seat without giving expression here in my place to the indignation I felt on seeing the senior member from Ohio offering his congratulations to my colleague at the close of his speech. Once before, during my legislative experience here, it has been my lot to witness a similar exhibition. Once before have I seen the enemies of the South congratulate a southern man on account of a speech he had made upon a question in which the rights of the South were involved.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Did I understand the gentleman to say that I went to Mr. GILMER and congratulated him? May I correct him in that statement?

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I am aware that the gentleman from Ohio congratulated him upon his speech. I saw the gentleman approach my colleague as he approached another gentleman upon a former occasion, who had made a speech in reference to southern rights. I saw the gentleman approach him with both hands extended, and imagined that he was pronouncing a benediction upon my colleague, which would be a withering curse upon him to his grave.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman intend to represent me as congratulating Mr. GILMER? Does he understand that I went towards Mr. GILMER to congratulate him?

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I say that the gentleman did go towards him, shake him by the hand, and, I suppose, congratulate him.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Let me say that the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. Why, sir, I saw it with my own eyes, and there were gentlemen upon this side whose attention was called to it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will correct the gentleman. Let me explain it.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to correct the gentleman. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, then, if he did not approach my colleague, at the conclusion of his speech, shake him by the hands, and offer his congratulations?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not. Mr. GILMER was in his place, and I was in the aisle. I inquired of him if he intended to compare my name with that of James Buchanan. I neither gave him my hand nor took his.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I know not, nor do I pretend to say, what occurred between the gentlemen. I say, again, that I not only saw the gentleman approach my colleague and extend towards him both hands—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I not only saw him, but some fifteen or twenty others saw him approach my colleague; and I must be permitted to say that, when I witnessed that spectacle, I felt, as I feel now, that whenever the time should come—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I say the gentleman is entirely mistaken. [Renewed and deafening shouts of "Order!"] from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. KEITT. I insist that order shall be preserved in the committee. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor, and declines to yield it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is out of order.

Mr. KEITT. The gentleman from Ohio— [Loud and continued shouts of "Order!"] from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. KEITT. Let the blackguards over there act thus outside of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. As I said before, I do not undertake to say what passed between the gentleman from Ohio and my colleague. I know not what the gentleman from Ohio said, but I know he said something very grateful to my colleague's feelings, for there was a smile of complacency on his face.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I say I did not take Mr. GILMER's hand. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. Many gentlemen here know that the scene occurred as I have described it; and, sir, as I was about to say when I was interrupted, when I witnessed it, I felt, as I feel now, that if ever the time should come when I should be so far capable of misrepresenting the honorable and confiding constituency which had sent me here to protect their rights and defend their honor, as to make a speech that would bring down upon my head the approbation and congratulations of the gentleman from Ohio and his allies upon that side, I should instinctively raise my hands to Heaven and, in the language of the Indian prince exclaim, "What have I done that the enemies of my country should praise me?" [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STANTON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PHELPS. It appears that nobody desires to discuss the bill, and I hope, therefore, that we shall report it to the House.

Mr. STANTON. I understand that there are some amendments to be proposed.

Mr. PHELPS. It will take but a short time to dispose of them. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I withdraw it.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to strike out the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines, and to insert in lieu thereof "$112,806," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $112,806.

Mr. Chairman, after this bill was acted on by the Committee of Ways and Means, a question arose in relation to the twenty per cent. allowance to the professors of the Academy at West Point. After an examination of the authorities, and the decision of the Secretary of War, the committee decided in favor of the allowance of twenty per cent. to the professors at West Point. It was decided by the Department that they were held to be commissioned officers. It merely allows the twenty per cent. (which was granted to all others) to the professors at the West Point Academy.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Chairman, we are in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I will say a few words in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SHAW.] I understood him to assert that, when one of his colleagues [Mr. GILMER] had concluded his speech, I went to him, extending my hands and taking his, and congratulated him on his speech. I endeavored to put the gentleman right at the time he was making this statement, but there was so much noise and confusion I am not sure whether gentlemen heard or understood me. However that may be, I desire the country, this House, and the gentleman, to know, that there was not one word of truth in what he uttered on that point. I went no nearer to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. GILMER] than the aisle up which I was passing; and, instead of congratulating him on his speech, I inquired whether he had used my name with the name of Mr. Buchanan. I remarked, further, that if he did, I should hold him responsible for it. I did not congratulate him on his speech; nor did I hear the remark of the gentleman, except as it was told me by other gentlemen. This is all there was of it. I did not congratulate him; I did not extend my hand to him; and I did not leave the aisle in passing up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In corroboration of what my colleague has just stated, I desire to say at this point that I was near the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] when he made his speech. My colleague, who has just taken his seat, passed up the aisle and protested against the use which had been made of his name in connection with that of James Buchanan, and then he passed on.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to say a word on the amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My colleague [Mr. SHAW] is out of the Hall, and I state this lest it be imagined that what has been said passed unnoticed by him.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] has the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will insert this rectification in his speech.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope I will be allowed to say a word.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Why not let the facts come out?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I dislike to interfere between my colleagues; but as the one who has spoken to-day [Mr. SHAW] is out of the Hall, I think injustice would be done him if I did not say a word here. I was sitting nearly where I am now when my colleague [Mr. GILMER] made his speech. As he sat down, I saw a crowd gather round him. A gentleman near me said: "Look at the Black Republicans, how they congratulate GILMER." I looked at that moment, and saw the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] near enough to put his hands upon my colleague and lean forward. I saw this, and I think I have eyes as good as most people; I did not hear what was said; I do not know that they grasped hands. They were near enough to do it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSSON] exclaimed loudly: "Kiss him! Kiss him!" calling the gentleman from Ohio by name. I looked at it, and many others did; I do not know what was said between them. This statement is due to my colleague. All of us supposed that it was a congratulation. The gentleman from Ohio knows exactly what did occur.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was near enough to hear the words. My colleague protested against the use of his name in connection with that of James Buchanan.

Mr. McQUEEN. Did the gentleman congratulate him?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did; for I thought then, and think now, that he made a damaging speech for Lee-Compton.

Mr. McQUEEN. How many copies of that speech did the gentleman subscribe for?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Three or four hundred; and they are so good, I wish I had more of them.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SEWARD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Military Academy appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

STADE DUES.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully solicited to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, any and all information in possession of the State Department on the subject of the "dues" or "tolls" levied and collected by the royal Hanoverian Government at Stade, upon the cargoes of all vessels sailing up the Lower Elbe to the commercial cities of Hamburg and Altona, as to their origin and foundation; the amount thereof, and the mode of collection; whether said information be derived from correspondence or otherwise, either with the Hanoverian Government direct, or indirectly through the American consul at Hamburg, in his correspondence with the authorities; to state whether it be true that the Hanoverian Government levies tribute upon the cargoes of vessels sailing upon the Lower Elbe (one of the highways of nations) without rendering any equivalent or return therefor; also, whether, in his opinion, these "dues" or "tolls" are not similar in nature, and equally as unjust in principle, as the old Tripolitan tribute was, and more so than were the Danish Sound dues; and if so, whether, in the opinion of his Excellency, notice ought not to be at once given by our Government to that of Hanover, that on and after the expiration of six months, our treaty with that Kingdom would terminate, and that after that time our Government would not recognize the right of Hanover to collect the "Stade tolls" upon our commerce ascending the Lower Elbe to Hamburg and Altona.

Mr. STANTON. I object, unless the resolution I send to the Chair be adopted. That will give us all a chance.

Mr. KELLY. Let the gentleman's resolution be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that resolution unless the last half be stricken out.

The resolution of Mr. STANTON was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the States and Territories be called for bills, of which notice has been given, for the purpose of reference, and resolutions which shall not be objected to, and continue the call without interruption, until all the States and Territories be called.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, (at four o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 21, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. R. ECKARD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the Senate, of the 5th instant, calling for copies of the instructions given to Mr. Reed, Commissioner to China; which, on motion of Mr. BRIGIT, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented two petitions from citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for carrying the mails between that city and Southampton, in England, in the Collins line of steamers; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the memorial of Ambrose W. Thompson and his associates, praying Congress to establish a line of mail steamships between certain ports in the United States and Liverpool, in England; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Cumberland and Allegany county, Maryland, praying that Cumberland may be selected as a suitable place for a national foundry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying that a law may be passed, granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the Army, and to the officers and seamen of the Navy during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Abner Merrill, for an increase of pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GREEN presented the petition of Robert F. Gibbs, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH presented papers in support of the claim of Adam Sener, a soldier in the war of 1812, for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of the legal representatives of William Bond, and the legal representatives of William Douglass, officers in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed interest on their half pay, paid under the act of June 30, 1834; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FOSTER presented the memorial of citizens of New London, Connecticut, remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DURKEE presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, against the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under the Le-compton constitution; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of John H. Merrill, praying for payment for services rendered, and expenses incurred, as sheriff to a court established by the alcalde in San Francisco, in 1849; also for expenses incurred in the relief and support of sick and disabled seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of R. L. Beall, and other officers of the Army, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 20) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in the case of sickness, or other disability, of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1856, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Albert G. Allen, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 277) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution relating to restrictions on the immigration or importation of foreign paupers and criminals into the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 278) concerning the courts of the United States in the district of Arkansas; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the papers relating to the claim of the heirs of Thomas Maddin, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the papers, and that leave be granted to withdraw the same; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 27) authorizing the suspension of the sales of public lands in the Territory of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PUGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 280) to repeal the twenty-fifth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. TOOMBS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to print, for the use of the committee, a bill before them for the establishment of uniform laws "on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

ABNER MERRILL.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of Abner Merrill, of Maine, in consequence of increased disability.

BUTTERFIELD'S PRIMING APPARATUS.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of Major William H. Bell, made April 1, 1858, giving the result of the trial, at the Washington arsenal, of Butterfield's priming apparatus, in comparison with Maynard's primer.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODERICK. I submit a resolution of inquiry, and ask for its consideration now:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish the Senate with a quarterly statement showing the aggregate amount collected at the post office at San Francisco, over and above the lawful postage; for box-rents from July 1, 1854, to December 31, 1857, and that he be requested to inform the Senate what law, or what regulation of the Department, authorizes the collection of the same; and also whether the postmaster has any legal authority to discriminate against one class of citizens, and in favor of another class, by withholding letters—as letters are withheld at the San Francisco post office—from those who will not submit to the exaction for box-rents, until at least an hour after letters are delivered to those who do thus submit to the exaction.

Mr. YULEE. I hope that will lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over under the rule.

DUNCAN ROBERTSON.

Mr. MALLORY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Duncan Robertson, have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it now. I will briefly state the object of it. The Senate will recollect that the Norwegian bark Ellen saved a number of the passengers of the Central America. She was subsequently put in good repair in one of our yards at a cost of $750, which has been paid by the Swedish consul—the consul of the country to which the vessel belonged. The House promptly passed the bill, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, to refund to him that amount of $750, and I think it eminently proper that the bill should pass the Senate now. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, therefore, to pass the bill at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 359) for the relief of Duncan Robertson.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Duncan Robertson $749 92, in full for moneys paid by him to the navy-yard at Gosport, it being the amount expended for repairs of the Norwegian bark Ellen, for damages encountered by the bark in aiding and rescuing the passengers of the steamer Central America.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JENNETT H. MCCALL.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the bill (S. No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of General Pickens's brigade, in the South Carolina regiment, during the war of the Revolution, the seven years' half pay of a captain, as allowed by the resolution of Congress, passed August 24, 1780, amounting to $2,100.

Mr. KING. Let the report in that case be read. The Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. EVANS, on the 9th of February:

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Colonel James McCall, of the revolutionary war, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The petitioner is an aged woman, eighty-six years old, and from her infancy has labored under a deformity in her feet. She is the only child and heir of James McCall, known in the history of the revolutionary war, in South Carolina and Georgia, as Colonel James McCall. It appears from the history of Georgia, and from other reliable sources, that he served with distinction and singular bravery in both of these States during a large portion of the war, and was in nearly all the battles which were fought during the invasion and possession by the British army of those States. During the greater part of the time he was only a militia officer, under the command of General Pickens, but it is believed, although no very conclusive evidence of the fact can now be obtained, that when the new organization of the army took place, in the fall of 1780, he was appointed to a command in one of the three regiments ordered to be raised in South Carolina as her part of the continental army, as it is said in the history of the times that he commanded the new levies of that State at the battle of the Cowpens, where Morgan obtained a signal victory over Tarleton.

In his accounts, copies of which have been furnished from the compiler's office of South Carolina, he is styled sometimes captain, and sometimes colonel. The latter title was probably a militia title, as the service was performed under General Pickens, a militia general. His rank in the new continental regiment of the State of South Carolina was probably that of a captain. Your committee do not, under the evidence of the facts of the case, feel authorized to give him any higher rank. It appears, satisfactorily, that in the discharge of his military duty he was attacked with the small-pox, of which he died in the year 1781. Your committee are therefore of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to the seven years' half pay of her father, she being at the time of his death only eleven years of age, and report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the bill read again. It strikes me that it is a very singular case.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very singular bill, and founded on a very curious state of facts. It does not appear that this man was anything more than a militia officer at all. The report itself admits that he was nothing more than a militia officer, for it says there is no conclusive evidence that he was anything else. I believe the resolution of 1780 only gave half pay to those who enlisted and served during the war.

Mr. EVANS. Those who served to the end of the war.

Mr. TOOMBS. And died in the service. If they died during their service they were entitled to it; but it appears that this man does not belong to the class, and that is a sufficient argument.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the first attempt of the kind I have ever heard of to introduce into that class persons who manifestly had no connection with it.

Mr. EVANS. There was no intention, and the report shows it, to introduce a new class. The only question was, whether this man belonged to the class provided for by the resolution. It is only stated in the report that he belonged to General Pickens's brigade. That is the fault of the one who drew the bill. He had belonged to General Pickens's brigade as a militia man, and General Pickens's brigade was nothing more than militia; but in 1780, on the reorganization of the army, three new regiments were ordered to be raised in the State of South Carolina; and the only question is, whether this man did not belong to that portion of the army. It is stated in the history of the times, that at the battle of the Cowpens he commanded new recruits. Well, the new recruits were those that were ordered to be raised by the resolution of 1780. If so, he belonged to the regular army; and if he belonged to the regular army, this bill is all right. It is stated very candidly in the report, that the proof was not entirely satisfactory; but the best conclusion I could come to from all the facts was, that he did belong to one of those three regiments.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to inquire of my friend from South Carolina if this bill does not come within the principle of the bill discussed at large at the last session of Congress, to which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] was opposed, and against which he made a speech?

Mr. EVANS. Not at all. That was a bill to pay, over and above the commutation which they had received, the half pay for life. That was the principle of that bill. It does not affect this at all. Bills like this have been passed from year to year ever since I have been here. The only question is, whether the man belonged to the class which was provided for by the resolution of 1780. My best judgment was that he did belong to the class, and therefore the bill was reported.

Mr. BIGGS. I understood, and if I am mistaken I desire to be corrected, that on Friday last, when this bill came up for consideration, it was objected to by the Senator from Alabama, not now in his seat, [Mr. CLAY.] I am aware, as the Senate is, that the Senator from Alabama is very well posted in regard to these questions of pensions; I believe he is a member of the Committee on Pensions, and his exposition of the case in regard to the revolutionary pensions, was certainly listened to by me with a great deal of interest, and I derive a great deal of information from it. His investigation has been a very thorough one of this whole subject; and I should be unwilling to consent that this bill should be put upon its passage in his absence, without the benefit of the light which he could throw upon it, as he objected to it the other day. I move, therefore, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. I am not going to oppose the motion to postpone; but I am merely about to say this: the postponement of a bill because Senators are not in their places, does not seem to me to treat claimants outside with justice. The Senate is the place where Senators ought to be. I did not notice, at the time I made the motion, that the Senator from Alabama was absent; nor was I aware that he said anything more the other day, than simply that he objected to the bill, probably because, as I supposed, he did not precisely understand it, or wished to look into it. If the point is made, I shall not urge the consideration of the bill now; but in consenting that it shall go over, I do not wish to be understood as giving a consent to the principle that bills must be postponed because Senators are not in their places. They ought to be in their places. I am perfectly willing that the bill shall be passed over until to-morrow.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. MASON. A short time since, the honorable Senator from Illinois, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] made a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations concerning the difficulties between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay in South America. The report was upon a reference made to that committee of a part of the President's message, which I will ask to have read. The committee have reported a resolution upon which I ask for the action of the Senate. The circumstances are of general and public interest, because, as shown by the message of the President, a very gratuitous and gross insult was offered to one of our ships by the Republic of Paraguay whilst in a river which formed the boundary between that and the adjacent Republic, which remains unatoned for. In addition, the President of that Republic has committed very great spoliation upon the property of American citizens from the State of Rhode Island, who had gone there under the instigation and under the auspices which he held out. I ask that the resolution may be taken up for consideration, and that that part of the President's message may be read.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay, in connection with the attack on the United States steamer Water Witch, and with other matters referred to in the annual message of the President, he be, and is hereby, authorized to adopt such measures and use such force as in his judgment may be necessary and advisable, in the event of a refusal of just satisfaction by the Government of Paraguay.

Mr. MASON. I ask that the resolution may be modified so as to make it a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified, unless objected to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MASON. I now ask the Clerk to read that part of the President's message to which I referred.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I regret to inform you that the President of Paraguay has refused to ratify the treaty between the United States and that State, as amended by the Senate, the signature of which was mentioned in the message of my predecessor to Congress at the opening of its session in December, 1853. The reasons assigned for this refusal will appear in the correspondence herewith submitted.

"It being desirable to ascertain the fitness of the river La Plata and its tributaries for navigation by steam, the United States steamer Water Witch was sent thither for that purpose in 1853. This enterprise was successfully carried on until February, 1855, when, whilst in the peaceful prosecution of her voyage up the Parana river, the steamer was fired upon by a Paraguayan fort. The fire was returned; but as the Water Witch was of small force, and not designed for offensive operations, she retired from the conflict. The pretext upon which the attack was made was a decree of the President of Paraguay, of October, 1854, prohibiting foreign vessels of war from navigating the rivers of that State. As Paraguay, however, was the owner of but one bank of the river of that name, the other belonging to Corrientes, a State of the Argentine Confederation, the right of its Government to expect that such a decree would be obeyed, cannot be acknowledged. But the Water Witch was not, properly speaking, a vessel of war. She was a small steamer, engaged in a scientific enterprise intended for the advantage of commercial States generally. Under these circumstances I am constrained to consider the attack upon her as unjustifiable, and as calling for satisfaction from the Paraguayan Government.

"Citizens of the United States, also, who were established in business in Paraguay, have had their property seized and taken from them, and have otherwise been treated by the authorities in an insulting and arbitrary manner, which requires redress.

"A demand for these purposes will be made in a firm but conciliatory spirit. This will the more probably be granted, if the Executive shall have authority to use other means in the event of a refusal. This is accordingly recommended."

Mr. MASON. From the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I will ask leave to read a very few extracts, which will show what led that committee to offer the resolution which has been read to the Senate. In speaking of the attack upon the steamer Water Witch, the report says:

"The only reasons ever given for the attack are that he [the President of Paraguay] had, some years after the Water Witch had been in those waters, published a decree forbidding foreign vessels of war to enter his rivers. English and French vessels of war now visit them. The place where the Water Witch was surveying was not under the jurisdiction of Paraguay. She was in waters over which the Argentine Confederation had, at least, concurrent jurisdiction, and in these she was engaged by authority of the published decrees of the Government of that Confederation, as well as by the direction of our own Government. She was, moreover, engaged simply in scientific investigations. With the President we concur that this pretext cannot be admitted as any excuse for this attack, and that it was an outrage which calls for satisfaction from the Paraguayan Government."

In the attack that was made upon the Water Witch, by a fort upon the Paraguayan side of the river, Parana, the man at the helm was killed, and three others were wounded, and several shots were fired into the hull of this small steamer. It was stated by Captain Page, in his official report, that at the time it was done a large portion of his crew were absent with him upon an exploring excursion on shore. The steamer was in command of the first lieutenant, Lieutenant Jeffers, who returned the fire, but with no other artillery than small boat-howitzers, which could have no effect; and finding the fire continued upon him, he was obliged to withdraw and retreat down the river. The impossibility even of defending the steamer was caused by the absence of a large portion of her crew with the commanding officer, under the circumstances I have mentioned. It is stated in the report, in addition:

"As early as 1845, the Government issued decrees inviting foreigners to bring to his country the implements, means, and processes of stimulating the industry of the country, and promising them the same privilege extended to inventors.

"Under these special encouragements, and relying upon the protection of that Government while engaged in lawful enterprise, a number of American merchants sent three steamers, with a large variety of the implements of American industry, to that country, and employed there more than twenty Americans in putting them in operation. They purchased lands and erected buildings, with the consent of Government, established cigar factories, and the first saw-mill erected east of the Andes and south of the equator; built wharves, and commenced the steam navigation of those waters. They employed large numbers of the people of the country, teaching them the processes of manufactures. But this success, being for their benefit and the benefit of his people, but very indirectly enhanced the wealth of Lopez," who was the President of the Republic. "It was not in accordance with the spirit of his monopolies, though he traded with the company to some extent. He first endeavored to induce the trained employees of the company to leave their service and enter into his own. Failing in this, he published the most arbitrary decrees; among others, forbidding foreigners to meet, except for purposes of society or innocent diversion; thus, of course, putting a stop to business. Also, forbidding foreigners to make contracts with peons or servants, except upon terms notified to, and accepted by, the Government—that is, himself.

"He also induced the people of the city, who, until the company excited his jealousy and displeasure, had treated the Americans with that grateful kindness which was natural towards honest and well-paying employees and benefactors, to change that conduct.

"The Americans were exposed to the greatest contumely, insult, and assaults in the streets and in their houses, which were the more incessant when under the universal protection of the police.

"When their enterprise was thus broken up, and themselves compelled to leave the country, Lopez refused them passports and permits for their embarkation, unless they would give up the title of their property; and not without the interposition of Commander Page would he withdraw his claim and allow them the possibility of escape to their own country."

It appears from the documents accompanying this report that merchants, I think chiefly from the State of Rhode Island, under the inducements held out by the Government of Paraguay, had sent these steamers with a very large supply of machinery of various kinds—which they were enabled safely to carry to that country—which they put up and put into successful operation, and by the permission of the Government, they had employed a number of peons, as they are called—the natives of the country, the Indians—in their employment. They were in very successful operation when they were thus suddenly, violently, and without cause, broken up and driven off by Lopez, who was the President of the Republic. For this, I think very properly, the President of the United States, in his message, states that he will take measures to demand redress; and I am informed, unofficially, that a vessel of proper size—a small one, however—has already been sent to that country, and that it is the intention to send out Captain Page, who will sail probably as early as the 1st of May, in a small steamer, to cooperate with that expedition. It is for the purpose of authorizing the President to use such force as he may deem necessary to procure proper reparation from this distant Power that the resolution has been offered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It would appear from the report of Captain Page, which is embodied in the report of the committee, that he had gone into those waters not only under the decree, but by the express invitation, of the Argentine Confederation, and was in the river Parana, over which, at least, that Confederation held concurrent jurisdiction with the offending Power, the Republic of Paraguay. He was absent for some three years and four or five months, and during that time succeeded in penetrating a number of those rivers, with the assent of the adjacent country, and obtained a great deal of valuable information for the mercantile interests of our country and for mercantile intercourse; and at one time I think he went, with a small steamer which drew nine feet of water, as far as seventeen hundred miles from the ocean by the river, when he was compelled to return because of this violent and unprovoked attack upon him by the Republic of Paraguay. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to pass the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with those merchants of Rhode Island, who were concerned in investing a very large amount of property in the expedition to Paraguay. They are of the highest character, and men of great responsibility. Their investment, I presume, amounted to several hundred thousand dollars, which has nearly all been lost. I hope some measures will be taken to obtain redress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will simply add to what the chairman of the committee has stated, that I investigated this subject thoroughly as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; examined all the papers accompanying the report; and I concur fully in what the chairman of the committee has said.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have heard this report. Now, Mr. President, in relation to all countries, unless they are uncivilized and barbarous, having no regular forms of government, and not reciprocating the interchange of proper representatives and ministers, the course of proceeding has been uniform, in cases of any violence, for the Executive to send to them the proper messengers, the proper officers, organs, and representatives of the Government, to demand redress. Negotiations are opened, and, if possible, redress is effected, or satisfaction in some way furnished or given. The Executive, in performing this duty, undoubtedly may use the naval force which we have, and which the President is now using, by sending steam-vessels, or other proper ships or frigates, to represent the country there. But as to using the force, the usual course I say has been this: after the executive Government have exercised all their powers, after they have exhausted all peaceful measures of obtaining redress, then they lay the matter before Congress, stating what they have done, submitting the correspondence which they have held, and the communications which have been had, and leave it to Congress to say whether they will order reprisals, or whether they will declare war, or what other measures they will authorize.

That has been the uniform course of our Government. I understand this resolution to go much further than this, and to propose the use of force. The President says he will use his means; he will send the proper officers and messengers to obtain redress, and he will endeavor to obtain it peacefully and quietly. Very well. We further understand that he proposes to send some show of naval force there with his messengers. Well, sir, that may be a wholesome dieting of the people. That is all very well, if he will not use force and violence, so that he may show at least an appearance of being in earnest.

But, sir, the proposition now is to clothe the President with power to use absolute force, if I understand it aright. It is in effect to authorize him to make a war, to use force and violence in relation to that people, if he cannot obtain redress by peaceable means. I have nothing to say by way of objection to what is necessary, for times and occasions may arise when it may be necessary to use force; but that is war de facto; and while the Constitution has reserved to Congress alone the power to declare war, I am unwilling, and it is an unprecedented thing, I think, to clothe the President with power to exercise war, actual force and violence, against any civilized people.

These are the difficulties which I have, and which, for the present, will prevent my voting for the resolution until it be in some way explained, or until some parallelism between this and some precedent heretofore exercised by our Government, shall be furnished.

Mr. MALLORY. The Committee on Foreign Relations doubtless have given this subject the consideration which it demands. It is a very grave question. It is a grave question in this light: the commerce of the Province of Paraguay is one of the most important on the whole La Plata. It has not yet been engrossed by any foreign country. Non-intercourse has been the policy of the Administration there. We are just about seeking to establish ourselves as favorites in this commerce. Some of our vessels have found their way up the river already. It appears to me to be a very novel method of establishing friendly relations with Paraguay, to clothe the President with power to send an armed vessel to seek redress for past grievances. I would not venture this opinion in the face of a committee who have examined the subject, had I not the best authority for saying that the Government of Paraguay are ready at any moment to make any proper redress for any grievances we have suffered at their hands. If I am correctly informed, the son of the late President, General Lopez, who may now be at the head of affairs there, is the influential person in the Administration of the country. He has said, and said frequently and openly, that had he been present—he was commanding the military force of Paraguay when the outrage was committed—he would have prevented it; and that whenever the time came to make redress, he would see that it was made, acknowledging the wrong.

Up to this hour, we have taken no legitimate and proper steps to right this wrong. We formed a treaty. It is a matter of public notoriety, published in the English papers, that the treaty was rejected by Paraguay, or rather not acted upon, because it had lain for two years at the mouth of the river, at the city of Buenos Ayres. We sent a minister; we charged him with the affairs of Paraguay. He did not go within one thousand eight hundred miles of his proper destination; he remained at Buenos Ayres the whole time, and never went to Paraguay. When we sent a chargé, subsequently, he found the treaty still remaining in the office of the minister, and Paraguay had never heard of it. This messenger carried it to Concepcion. When General Lopez saw it, as the English papers state, he found fault with the American Government, because the Senate had made thirty-three amendments to a treaty which he had negotiated, and which would have expired by its own limitations in a very short time. He immediately offered to make a new treaty, acknowledging the wrong inflicted on our vessel; and he desired to right it, and said he wished to have the most friendly relations with the American Government; but our agent had no authority to make a new treaty, and reported that fact to this Government.

Now, sir, I am exceedingly anxious to see measures taken to right the wrong complained of by these Rhode Island merchants; but I venture to say that, whenever this matter shall be investigated, we shall find that they have not been without wrong on their side also, and that some of the complaints of General Lopez, the President of Paraguay, are founded in justice, and that we ourselves will have to acknowledge it. There are concessions to be made on both sides. I submit here whether or not it would not be best to strike out as much of the resolution as authorizes the President to use such force as exigencies may demand there. There would be no force required. Send an agent to Paraguay who understands the theory of the Government, who speaks the language of the country, and you will deal with an Administration not only anxious to right those wrongs, but anxious to be placed on the most friendly footing with the American Government. We shall find that we are dealing with friends, not enemies. She is a young Republic, and is now on the verge of a war with Buenos Ayres, which, under the name of the Argentine Confederation, has been overshadowing all the other Republics there. It would be exceedingly ungracious to send a message of this kind to her when she is on the eve of a war with a large Power.

Mr. HUNTER. The hour has now arrived for the consideration of the special order. I call for it.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to inquire whether the report of the select committee, accompanying the bill for the ascertainment and settlement of claims for French spoiliations, has been printed? I have not seen it. It was made long ago. If it has been printed, I desire merely to give notice that I shall, on Wednesday next, desire to call up that bill for consideration. If there has not been an order for printing, I hope one will be made.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly it ought to be made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I supposed one had been made on my motion. I certainly so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that both the report and bill have been printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Then I will say, that on Wednesday next, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, I shall call up that bill for consideration.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, the pending question being on Mr. FESSENDEN's amendment to add the following additional section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for, or applied to, the service of any other year, nor be transferred to or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated. And no contract for Army supplies, or service of any description, shall be hereafter made during the session of Congress, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; nor shall any such contract be made hereafter, at any time, without previous public advertisement for proposals respecting the same.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to ascertain from the Senator from Maine if he desires to accomplish what I think that amendment will provide in this respect. The moneys which are appropriated in this bill are appropriated for this fiscal year. Does he mean that they shall be applied only to services to be performed within the fiscal year? Now, it is known that a large portion of this appropriation is especially designed, although it is in what is called a deficiency bill, for the service of the next fiscal year—so far as subsistence is concerned, for twenty months ahead. Therefore, if his amendment be passed, none of this money could be used for the very purposes which were contemplated when the bill was brought in. It could only be used for service performed within this fiscal year. If anything should be required after the 1st of July next, no part of this appropriation could be used. Is that his intention?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill, Mr. President, may need amendment in that particular. There is another amendment, which I have laid upon the table, and which I propose to offer in case this be adopted, which would be an answer to the question put by the Senator from Virginia. The difficulty with this bill is, that it confounds appropriations for different terms. In my judgment it is very inaccurate, and should have been amended. The account of what is necessary to be appropriated, going to make up this aggregate, may be found in one of the miscellaneous documents which the Finance Committee had before them. That document sets out that there is a deficiency under several heads of expenditure, as the chairman undoubtedly recollects, for the year 1857. It also states that there will be certain deficiencies for the year 1858, this present year; that is to say, that there is a want of a sufficient appropriation to meet the calls of this year. It then goes on to state that another very large amount, making more than half the sum appropriated in the bill, is required for the purposes of the next fiscal year, and of the fiscal year succeeding the next, up to a certain point; that is to say, for the year closing July 1, 1859, and a part of the year closing in July, 1860, and all these appropriations are prospective, and have reference to prospective operations in Utah.

Now, sir, the amendment which I have laid upon the table proposes to appropriate all that is desired for the deficiencies of the year 1857; also all that is desired (so far as I am able to come to any conclusion from looking over the document referred to) to make up the supposed deficiencies for the year ending June 30, 1858. I propose to go no further, but to strike out of the bill all that is proposed to be appropriated for any period after the existing year, because that is not properly a deficiency, supposing that if anything more is necessary to be done, as we have arrived nearly to the end of the session, there will be ample time to make all the appropriations that may be necessary for the year 1858-9; that is to say, so far as we can constitutionally and properly go into the year 1859.

The difficulty is, that after stating all these things as needful, in order to carry on the operations, the Department has jumbled them all together under the appropriate heads; that is to say, instead of giving us distinctly the appropriation wanted for the year 1858, for instance, it states the amount necessary, then the amount necessary for another year, and the amount of deficiency in 1857, and puts them altogether in one item of the bill; thus compelling us, under the head of deficiencies at this period of the session, and without having the regular estimates for the next year before us, and under our consideration, to make all these appropriations, as well what are not deficiencies as what are deficiencies; and to give our sanction to the proposed action of the Government, as well as to give our sanction to what is necessary to pay the debts already incurred, which I deem to be entirely improper.

Then I answer the question put by the chairman thus: I do design to accomplish just that purpose, because I have laid my other amendment on the table with that view, to appropriate specifically all that is demanded for the deficiencies of the year 1857, all that seems to be demanded for the necessities of 1858, stopping there, and leaving the other matter to be disposed of in the regular course of appropriations for the coming year, which will be in ample time for that purpose.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator will find, when he comes to examine the document to which he has alluded, that it is impossible for him to discriminate between the deficiencies which properly belong to the year 1858, and the money which will be necessary to carry out contracts that are made in this year. Some of these appropriations were asked on the ground, not that they were deficiencies, but because if we should make them ahead, it was said the supplies could be transported much more economically to the Government, than if the period of making the appropriation was delayed so as to throw the transportation in the season of the year when the grass had failed on the plains.

I recollect, sir—I have it by me—seeing a table which was presented by my colleague in the House of Representatives, who had charge of this bill, showing the difference in the cost of transportation if we availed ourselves of this particular season, which closes, I think, on the 31st of August, and if we waited until it was over. I think the cost is nearly double. The Department, then, in order to avail itself of this peculiar season, and in order to transmit the supplies in time, (because it is not proper, if there should be difficulty, if there should be collision and war, that the Army should be exposed to the risk of wanting supplies of any sort, either of arms or of ammunition or of food,) proposed that we should appropriate enough now to accomplish the object of carrying the troops who have been ordered to Utah and the supplies necessary for them. The contracts embrace both, because it would be impossible for the Senator to discriminate, or, I believe, for the War Department itself.

Now, sir, if the Senate should think that it is not proper to furnish supplies for any except those troops who are already there, or if they should think it is not proper to expend this money for any other services than those that are rendered in the year 1858, that object can only be accomplished by providing by law, that no part of the money appropriated shall be expended for anything else, except for services rendered in the year 1858. The Senator may draw up a legal provision, requiring the mode in which this money shall be expended to be reported, and to forbid any part of it to be expended except for services rendered in this fiscal year, if that is his purpose, and the Senate concur with him in that purpose. I think it is a fair question for the consideration of the Senate. I believe the effect of doing this would only be to expose the Government to additional expense, and perhaps to expose our Army to the danger of inconvenience from a want of supplies at the proper season.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. I think the Senator is mistaken, because the other contracts which are supposed to have been, and which undoubtedly have been made, and which were of a very singular character, some of them, run through the next fiscal year; and it is not to be supposed that any very material part of the money appropriated by this bill will be called for during the present fiscal year—that is to say, but very small parts of the contracts can be performed during the present year for transportation. The furnishing of the wagons, horses, and those things, for which provision is made, may undoubtedly be concluded during the present fiscal year; but the contracts run through the whole of the next year, and, indeed, the succeeding year. That being the case, the refusal to allow the use of the money appropriated to this year for the service of the next year, will not at all interfere with the performance of those contracts, because we can very easily make an appropriation in the general appropriation bill for the Army, at the end of this session, covering all these contracts. If the Senate are disposed to assume them, to sustain them, and to sustain this policy of the Administration, there is no difficulty about it. Their not appropriating the money at this moment will not affect the matter at all. We can appropriate the money in the general bill. My object is to appropriate now all the money that can possibly be called for during the residue of this fiscal year, and I think my amendment meets it; and then if we are disposed to sustain this course of the Administration and carry out these contracts, there is abundance of time during this session of Congress to make all the appropriation necessary to go on with them. As things are now, the Senator will see, by the very document to which I have referred, that the money will not be called for several months.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator has failed to show that under his amendment the inconvenience would be provided for which I have stated. These contracts run through that period. It is true we are to pay so much a pound for what is transported; but if you limit the appropriation so that we are not able to pay for the transportation of what will be necessary for these five thousand troops, of course the Department will not send them by the contractor; they will cease to dispatch these supplies; they will wait until the general appropriation is made; and if they do wait until it is made, they will lose the favorable season for transportation.

If the Senate were to adopt such an amendment as this, it would not be proper for the Secretary of War to send forward supplies in advance of the money appropriated; and if he waits until it is appropriated in the regular bill, he will lose this season. If the Senator means to appropriate it at last, what good purpose will be answered by dividing it into two installments, appropriating a part now, and a residue of the amount in the general bill? It is a mere difference as to the time of appropriation. If you appropriate the whole amount now, this season, which is a short one, can be used for the purpose to which I have referred. If you wait to appropriate the other portion until the regular bill is passed, then, when this money is exhausted, they will stop sending forward supplies under these contracts, because non constat that Congress will appropriate money for it. The Department will not take the risk, especially after such a vote as this. These supplies are necessary in order to provide for the wants of the troops who are converging from all quarters of the Union towards the valley of Utah. There are something like five thousand troops in motion. These supplies are wanted to provide for them on the way, and to provide for them after they get there. We have no means of discriminating and saying how much money will be wanted to supply the transportation which is necessary up to the 1st of July, 1858, and how much will be wanted afterwards. The Department can ascertain that the general service will probably require this amount, and therefore they estimate for this amount in gross; but they specially state that part of it is not a deficiency, but is an additional supply, and they give the reason why it should be granted.

I think if we intend to furnish supplies to that amount of troops, we ought to do it now. There is a decided economy in doing it now. If we do not, if we mean to limit the expedition, or if we mean to stop the expedition, we ought to do so in plain and specific terms; we ought to do so in terms which cannot be misunderstood, instead of curtailing the supplies on principles which may mean one thing or may mean another. If it be the purpose of the Senator from Maine, and if the Senate concur with him in that purpose, to stop any addition to the troops who are now in Utah, let him say so in his amendment, and let him provide that no part of this money shall be appropriated to any addition to be made there. If, on the other hand, he does not intend to interpose so as to prevent troops from going forward, as they have been ordered by the commanding general and by the Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President; if he does not mean to prevent their being concentrated in this valley, then he ought to be willing to adopt the readiest, the speediest, and the most economical means of furnishing them with the proper transportation and supplies.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The two amendments which I have proposed cannot, of course, be very well considered together, but they are parts of the same whole, and, perhaps, necessarily in some degree dependent on each other. One of my objects is undoubtedly to say, most distinctly, that Congress does not at present authorize the proposed movement on Utah of this large additional body of troops. If Congress should refuse to grant the supplies asked for—that is to say, should confine itself to those which are necessary to the ordinary expenses of the Army, as at present located, taking into consideration the two thousand five hundred troops that are in Utah now, and should go no further—that is one thing; and I have drawn the amendment so as to present as distinctly as I can to the Senate, the question whether they will leave the matter as it is now in reference to the movement on Utah, or whether they will distinctly recognize and authorize the movement of this large additional body of troops, about three thousand or thirty-five hundred, I believe—I do not know how many—a very much larger force than is there now.

The proposition contained in the bill is to make appropriations to a sufficient amount to pay all the expenses of transportation and supplies for the whole body; and not only that, but to go twenty months ahead, considering the distance of the country. I did not propose to say anything upon that point precisely in this connection; but in my judgment we have not now information enough upon which to justify that action. None certainly has been communicated to us by the Department. What I propose to do, therefore, is to go just so far as this: to appropriate all that seems to be needed for the army located as it is at present, and for transportation purposes, so far as the army at present in Utah is concerned, and to confine the use of this money to the year and to the objects for which it is appropriated. Then, sir, if, when we are considering the general appropriation bill for the service of next year, it seems good to Congress to make these additional appropriations, and to authorize this large proposed increase of force in Utah, that is another thing.

Now, as to the question of economy, it does not come up at all, and the Administration has relieved us of the necessity of considering that question. It has made its contracts; it has taken it for granted that all this would be done. It is not for the Administration to say now, after these contracts are made, that it will not send forward the supplies, and will not take any steps. They have not reserved that power.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will reflect, he will remember that they certainly have. The contract is to send forward the supplies which the Administration may send, at so much a pound; and if you diminish the appropriation they may not send them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The contract for beeves specifies a particular quantity.

Mr. HUNTER. They are to be delivered as required, to the number of two hundred and fifty head; but if they are not required, they will not be delivered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think not; but I have not read with entire particularity.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is it; two hundred and fifty at a time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As they may be required?

Mr. BENJAMIN. As required.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be so. Still, however, we are not, in my judgment, to be embarrassed or to be precluded from acting on the subject, by reason of this consideration. The difficulty is, that the War Department proper has not presented the matter to us at all. Here is an estimate that comes from the quartermaster's department, as I understand, to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House. We have no recommendation from the War Department proper, and we have no recommendation from the President. They do not seem to be desirous of taking the responsibility of these recommendations one way or the other; but they have gone forward and made these arrangements, and made these estimates, thus, in fact, throwing, or trying to throw, the whole responsibility of originating the matter upon Congress; while, at the same time, they make these statements and place us in the attitude of accepting or rejecting the appropriations, being responsible for the amount we grant.

I am disposed, at present, as we have only a few weeks later to remain here during which we can act on the whole matter, to make now the appropriations necessary for this year, and make the others in the general bill. It is very strange that at this particular season of the year we should be pushed so hard on the ground of economy! Why has it not been done long before? Why was it kept back?

Mr. HUNTER. These estimates have been some months before us. Congress would not act upon them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why has not the Administration majority of the House of Representatives seen the necessity of acting and voting these supplies? They have kept them off for a long time.

Mr. IVERSON. It has not got a majority.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is an admission that I hardly expected from the majority here.

Mr. IVERSON. The reason is, that there are so many deserters from its ranks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee of Ways and Means certainly had the power to make the report at an early day, because they made it without dissent at last. Why should they have kept that report off until so late a period of time, and when it comes into this House we should be urged to act immediately, because contracts have been made, and the movement must be made at once? I see no reason for it.

Mr. HALE. This amendment of the Senator from Maine consists of three distinct propositions; and if he will not consider it an interference with him, I should like to have a division of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE. Then if the Chair thinks the amendment can be divided under the rules, I should like to have it divided. It contains, first, a proposition that the appropriations shall be devoted to the service of the specific year for which they are voted. Its second proposition is, that no contracts shall hereafter be made without advertisement. That is the law now, but it is disregarded; so that I suppose it is necessary to reenact it. The third proposition is, that no contracts shall be made under the authority given in the exception contained in the sixth section of the act of May 1, 1820, while Congress is actually in session. The amendment which I offered, and which was voted down yesterday, was, that it should not be done at all; but this amendment of the Senator from Maine restricts and limits the Department so that it cannot be done while Congress is actually in session. As these three propositions are all in one section, it strikes me that it may be divided. The sense of each of them is different. One man may be for one and not for another; and I wish to have them divided. The Senator from Georgia says they have had a good many deserters from the Administration ranks. I see that there is an appropriation in this bill to pay for catching deserters. I want to know if it is going to be appropriated for any of them. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The Chair considers that the proposition is susceptible of division.

Mr. HALE. Then I desire a distinct vote to be taken on each of the three propositions contained in the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia what amount was appropriated last year in the general appropriation bill for transportation and supplies for the Army? I mean for the year 1857-58—I call it the present year.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot tell without referring to the document. I think the amount was about two million dollars for transportation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Supplies and transportation are both included in this deficiency bill. I ask for this information because I think it has been usual, heretofore, when a proposition of this sort was made, to present some basis, some reason for it.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot lay my hand on the document just now. As soon as I find it I will inform the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will wait till the Senator finds it.

Mr. STUART. I think, sir, that there is a portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine which may be adopted with propriety, and the adoption of which will secure great economy. I believe it is conceded, generally, that the expenditures in the quartermaster's bureau are, in amount, very great; and I think the belief is general that the economy of that department might be very much improved. This amendment certainly will have some effect in that direction. I have listened with very great attention to the remarks of the chairman of the Finance Committee to see if there were any valid or substantial objections to it, and I confess I have not been convinced of any. I see no reason why appropriations for a deficiency for the service of a particular year may not be, with propriety, confined to paying for the service of that year. It does not follow, as was suggested by the chairman of the committee at the outset of this discussion, that the payment must be made within the year; it may be made at any time within the two years, the general limitation of the appropriation before it goes to the surplus fund.

The proposition of this amendment is to confine it to paying for the service of the year; it is simply to prevent paying for the service of 1858 by appropriations made to pay for that of 1857. It must, I think, be conceded that there is very great difficulty in limiting the action of the War Department to an extent that may be general with other Departments of this Government. Emergencies do arise, they arise constantly in the service of the country; and neither Congress, nor the President, nor the Secretary of War, can tell when one is about to arise, or when it will arise. My belief, therefore, is, that that species of legislation which makes the most constant, direct, and specific accountability to Congress and to the country, is the legislation which will secure the greatest economy; and I think this part of the amendment of the Senator from Maine does, in a measure, secure that result. By it, Congress says to the Department, "you report a deficiency for 1858; we will give you the money for what you report, but we will not allow you to use any surplus you may have for that year for a deficiency in the service of 1857, or 1859, or any other year."

I conceive, sir, that there is in the authority which has been exercised to use appropriations made for one purpose to the payment of expenditures for other purposes, a very dangerous latitude of discretion. I can conceive very readily that any executive officer of this Government would say, when there was a proposition made to him to expend for a particular purpose, for which purpose he had no money, "I decline to do it; there is not a pressing necessity; I can avoid it, and therefore I will avoid it;" and I can also conceive that, if he had the power to transfer funds from another appropriation to meet that necessity or that emergency, he would do it, and would do it when it might be avoided.

Now, sir, it is impossible for any individual to point out the instances in which this would be done; but it lies in the nature of the service and in the nature of man. In the one instance, he is to report to Congress that he has done a specific act, and requires the money to pay for it, and then he is held to a direct accountability, because the attention of Congress is directed to the very act, and Congress will pass judgment whether it was justifiable or unjustifiable. But if you allow him, as I said, to do this act, and transfer from another appropriation the money with which to pay for it, he will exercise less caution, less prudence, and less economy; therefore, as to that branch of the amendment, I must say that I am decidedly for it.

As to the other branch of the amendment, while I am up, I will call the attention of the honorable Senator from Maine to it; for I think it may be improved, and improved within the necessities and the probable emergencies that may arise. The grounds of it were suggested yesterday by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE;] and I asked him to offer, in the shape of an amendment, what his views were. He did so; and necessarily having to be absent from the Senate, he left it with me; and I propose to add to the first provision of the amendment of the Senator from Maine the following, as meeting the views which I have just submitted to the Senate. It is in the shape of an additional section, but its language can be changed if deemed necessary:

And be it further enacted, That whenever, hereafter, contracts shall be made by the Secretary of War by virtue of the sixth section of the act of 1820, chapter 52, he shall, if Congress be in session at the time, promptly report to both Houses thereof, the reasons for making such contract, stating fully all the facts and circumstances which, in his judgment, rendered such contract necessary. If Congress be not in session at the time of making such contract, he shall, at the commencement of the next session, make such report to both Houses. And no such contracts shall be made, hereafter, except in cases of pressing exigency.

This, as I said, meets my views as to the extent we can safely go. I concede the argument that is submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and by other Senators, that if a war breaks out, if there is an insurrection, or any other emergency that makes a prompt movement of troops necessary, it is out of the question to stop and give notice to make the contract; and the alternative submitted by the honorable Senator from Maine, I will say to him, seems to me, to be worse than to leave it as it is; that is to say, to admit here that in such a contingency the Secretary may set the law at defiance, and Congress will justify him. Sir, I dislike that; I concede that there might be great emergencies in the service of the country when a public officer might feel the necessity of doing that, and when Congress would justify him in doing it, and when the country too would justify him; but we ought not by legislation to create inducements for such a necessity.

It seems to me, therefore, (and with this repetition, for which I hope the Senate will pardon me, I shall have submitted all that I desire to say on this subject,) that when we provide for a prompt and immediate report to Congress of the act done, the necessity and the reasons for doing it, and the amount of money required to pay for it, we shall have secured all that can be safely secured, agreeably to the nature of the business of the War Department. In the other Departments of the Government time is not so essential. They have time to give their notices and to have all their contracts made according to them, without any great difficulty in the service of the country; but necessarily, in the movement of troops and the making of contracts for their support and furnishing them with supplies by the War Department, it seems to me that it is impossible to do that.

Now, sir, with the exceptions to which I have referred in one of the Senator's amendments, I say to him that I am decidedly in favor of every other suggestion he has made; and I must say to my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that I do not see the necessity of appropriating in this deficiency bill for the service of 1859 or 1860. I understand from the honorable Senator from Maine that there are appropriations asked for here for expenses in both 1859 and 1860. I think the Senate may well pause and say, in regard to these items, that we will wait until the general Army appropriation bill comes up. We shall lose nothing by a delay for that time. If it be ten days, or fifteen, or thirty days, whatever the time is, there may be such developments in the history of the Utah insurrection, and in the affairs of the country generally, as to satisfy us that no such appropriation is necessary; at all events, if the necessity which is now supposed to exist shall continue, we may better make appropriations in the general appropriation bill for 1859 and 1860 than to make them in this deficiency bill, and hence I agree with the honorable Senator from Maine in the amendment that he has proposed to meet that difficulty. I like it, again, because it is in pursuance of the views which I have just submitted to the Senate, to specify as nearly and as exactly as you can the subjects for which you propose to make the appropriations. There is an objection to asking for a gross amount of money, and leaving it to the discretion of some subordinate officer of this Department to say how he will use it. The idea, the paramount idea that I have sought to submit to the Senate in these few remarks is, that to compel the Departments and all their subordinates to specify as accurately and distinctly as the subject-matter will permit, the particular purpose for which they ask money, is the great means of securing economy in expenditure. I hope, therefore, that the basis of these amendments will be agreed to, and if there be anything wrong in their phraseology let that be corrected.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that the Senator from Michigan is mistaken as to the actual state of the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not like to interfere, but I sat down while the Senator from Virginia was looking at the paper.

Mr. STUART. I beg pardon of the Senator from Rhode Island; I thought he had yielded the floor entirely.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much delighted with what the Senator from Michigan has said, so very much better than I could have said it.

Mr. HUNTER. For the transportation of troops and supplies, the appropriation for the present year is $1,800,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. For both these objects?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; "transportation of troops and supplies, $1,800,000."

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, what is it proposed to appropriate as a deficiency in this bill for these two objects?

Mr. HUNTER. The appropriation is not for a deficiency, but sixteen or twenty months ahead.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The appropriation for transportation and supplies in this bill is between five and six million dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, I submitted a few remarks yesterday upon this subject, and I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the view I endeavored then to present, and to another objection that struck me from the remarks he made yesterday in reference to confining the appropriations to the year for which they are made. As I said before, I do not think it ought to be understood, when we are trying to fix responsibility and to guard the appropriations for the war purposes of this Government, that we are opposing any Administration, or opposing this bill. I repeat, that I am willing to vote for any proper, reasonable amount for the support of the Army, under the direction of this War Department, as readily as if it were under the direction of any other Administration. But I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia when, without the proposition made by the Senator from Maine to limit this appropriation to the year for which it is made, it will go to the surplus fund, if it is not expended this year, under the law of the country?

Mr. HUNTER. The appropriations last for two fiscal years. After that they go to the surplus fund.

Mr. SIMMONS. We make an appropriation here for the deficiencies of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1858. The Senator says that when it is ascertained that it is not all expended in that year, it may be expended for 1859; but we shall, in the general appropriation bill, make an appropriation for 1859; and how will you discriminate between the money that you now appropriate, and that which you will appropriate, it may be a fortnight hence? The Constitution requires that all appropriations made for the support of the Army shall be limited to two years, and what was the object of that? It was that no Congress should pass appropriations for the support of an Army that could be continued by any process for an indefinite period.

Mr. HUNTER. I have just explained that it could not be. Not a cent of this appropriation can be used after the expiration of the next fiscal year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then an appropriation lasts for only one year after it is made.

Mr. HUNTER. It is for two fiscal years. At the expiration of two fiscal years, it goes to the surplus fund.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I should like to know of the Senator from Virginia, if we are not making an appropriation to-day for the next fiscal year?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will it go to the surplus fund at the end of that year, or will it go on for another year?

Mr. HUNTER. It will go to the surplus fund at the end of that year, because technically, it is an appropriation for this year, though it is designed to be used in the next year. It is for the service of the next year.

Mr. SIMMONS. The standing law that was read here yesterday was, that two years after the expiration of the fiscal year, for which the appropriation was made, if not expended, it should go to the surplus fund.

Mr. HUNTER. Once, I think.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was two as read yesterday. Perhaps it was a mistake, but as it was read, it said two years. I think the Senator from Virginia read it himself, but he might have made a mistake. Certainly if we appropriate now for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1859, it will continue liable to be drawn for the very object for which we have appropriated it until the end of the year 1860, according to his account, and here is an appropriation of five or six millions, which is three times as much as the ordinary appropriation for the service, made in a lump.

Now, I say that, viewing this question as I have been in the habit of viewing such questions, this is an unreasonable proposition to be made to the Senate. We ought either to confine the appropriation and let its contingent expenditure be limited to this exigency, or else we ought to have some definite information about it. If we confine it, as the Senator from Maine proposes, to whatever may be required for this fiscal year, and if not expended for that to go into the Treasury again, no harm can arise; but if you apply three times as much as the ordinary expenditures for this service, they can use the balance of this year for the next, and they can use what you appropriate next year for the succeeding one, and so keep a balance of two years all the time ahead to come and go upon, whenever a contingency arises that the Executive wants to use this money. That, I am perfectly clear, is a power that the Constitution never contemplated we should give.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Two years from and after the expiration of the fiscal year for which money is appropriated, it goes to the surplus fund. That is the law. I have it before me.

Mr. SIMMONS. So I heard it read yesterday. If that is the case, I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the point whether it is not in direct contravention of the Constitution to make such an appropriation as he is now asking us to make to-day, of $6,000,000, more or less, for this and the next succeeding fiscal year, and which by a fair construction may be carried to the end of the year 1861, before it goes to the surplus fund. The fiscal year for which part of this appropriation is to be made, and which he contends is necessary to be made on account of the grass, ends in 1859, and the law says that it takes two years after that before it goes to the Treasury. I say that is an infraction of the Constitution; and any man, I think, who is disposed to consider it candidly and fairly, must see it.

Now, what does the Senator from Maine propose? He proposes that an appropriation shall be made, but that it shall be made for the expenditures of the present fiscal year; not that it shall be spent this year, but that any claim arising in this year shall be paid out of this money, and then it shall go to the surplus fund, or to the common Treasury; and, in my deliberate judgment, no man can regard such a measure as at all hostile to the purposes of this bill, and I do not think any proposition that has been made here reflects at all on the conduct of the War Department any more than the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina the other day, that no more extra pay should be voted to clerks and employes was a reflection on the House of Representatives. I did not consider it a reflection on them, but I thought it was bringing them back to where the law brought them, and where they ought to be all the time. It was saying, "we will pay this, as you have voted it, but hereafter you shall go according to law." That is all I understand this amendment to be. I ask the Senator from Virginia if I am not right; if this money is not absolutely within the control of this Department for the next three years unless you limit it? and I should like to hear him on that point.

Mr. HUNTER. I apprehend that no military appropriations can be used for a period longer than two years, because the Constitution prohibits it. I have not been able to turn to the statute in regard to the surplus fund; but if it does provide that an appropriation shall endure for two years after the end of the fiscal year for which it is made, (and in that I think the Senator is mistaken, for in my opinion, it is only one year,) of course it is limited in regard to military appropriations, because the Constitution forbids a longer period in respect to them.

But, Mr. President, what is it that the gentlemen are arguing so strenuously to change? There is a provision that an appropriation, when made for any particular branch of the service—say for transportation and supplies—may be subject to the use of the Department for two years, and no longer. We have practiced under this ever since 1795. I have never heard any inconvenience alleged under it. It is said that there is a want of responsibility. How? It is said that it is not specific. Why not specific? The Secretary of the Treasury estimates for each specific item what he wants.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to this law?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the tenth section of the statute passed in 1852, the civil and diplomatic bill of that year:

"That when any money shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriations by law other than for the payment of interest on the funded debt * * * * * for more than two years, after the expiration of the fiscal year in which the act shall have been passed, all and any such appropriations shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined; and the moneys so unexpended shall be immediately thereafter carried, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the account on the books of the Treasury denominated the surplus fund."

Mr. HUNTER. Be it so, sir. It seems then that it has been the unbroken usage of the Government ever since 1795, to allow an appropriation to be used for two years after the expiration of the fiscal year for which it is passed, subject to the uses of the Department; and the objection urged to that now, for the first time, is that it destroys responsibility on the part of the heads of Departments. Now I say, how? The head of a Department reports specifically what he wants on each item. He says, "to meet this I have a certain unexpended balance of appropriation in regard to that item, that has a year to run; I want in addition to that perhaps nothing." Perhaps, however, he may want something more in order to meet the unexpected service of the year. Congress then appropriates specifically—it makes a specific appropriation in addition to this unexpended balance; or if it is enough, it makes no appropriation. It acts on a full view of the subject. It knows what is already subject to the uses of the Department under that head. It only adds to them what may be necessary to meet the wants of that fiscal year.

But the Senator from Michigan says that this is no specific appropriation, because the Secretary of War may transfer afterwards. Sir, he cannot transfer under the law if the appropriation be more than a year old; and if it be less than one year old, he is limited in his power of transfer to the subsistence, the medical, and the quartermaster's departments. He cannot transfer appropriations for other specific items. It is only upon these heads that transfers can be made; and when it is done, he has to return to Congress an account of his expenditures, so that Congress can see, according to the old system under which we have acted so long, what is asked under each head, what is appropriated under each head, and what is expended under each head. What more, sir, can be done to insure responsibility? We find that the provision which allows the appropriations to be used for that length of time has been eminently convenient, and particularly so in a Government like ours, extending over so large a territory, when the accounts from some portions of it come in so tardily. No reason has been offered for curtailing it.

The whole amount of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, when you come to carry it out for a series of years, will be, that the appropriations can only be used for one year. They can only be used for one year unless there may be some services in that year which are not paid in the fiscal year, and balances may afterwards be used if there should be any to be applied to that service—that is all. It amounts to a change of the act in regard to the surplus fund. It amounts to a change in the practice of the Government, which is almost as old as the Government itself, and it exposes the Department not only to the inconvenience, probably, of opening more different accounts, as it certainly would, but it exposes Congress to the necessity of appropriating more frequently, in order to attain the same object. If gentlemen could show that any mischief had arisen under the old practice, they might have some reason for asking the change; but they have shown none, and I think they can show none. Now, sir, in regard to this particular change, the Senator does not effect his object of preventing the Executive from sending forward supplies for more troops than are already in Utah, by his amendment. He may say, "I will not appropriate more money than I suppose (for it is a guess of his, at least) will be necessary for that object;" but it does not take away the authority which the President has, under the law, and which the Secretaries have, under the law, to make these contracts, and to change the position of the troops. He leaves all that authority; he leaves them the power of running us in debt for these objects, and simply says he will not pay them now. What is the effect of it? They have to go upon credit in order to attain their object. They have to expose the Government thus to a greater cost by being forced to go upon credit, than having the money to use for that purpose. Is any object attained by that? On the contrary, if the Senator desires to prevent this money from being used for these purposes, the only way he can attain his object will be to say so in the terms of the law, and say that it shall only be used for such purposes. He cannot attain his object by limiting the supply of money, because the authority for contracting the debt still exists.

Sir, in regard to his proposition as to advertisements, I think that has been so fully answered by the Senator from Michigan, and others, that it is hardly worth while for me to go further into the matter.

It will be for the Senate to determine whether there is economy in making this appropriation ahead now or not. It is proposed, for instance, to make an appropriation for subsistence of actually upwards of a million dollars. The commissary of subsistence tells us that if that be made, it will involve a reduction in the appropriation of next year; you will not want so much in the appropriations for the next fiscal year; but the reason given is, that if it be made at once, the supplies can be transported more cheaply. If the Senate think that is not a sufficient reason, they can strike that out. If they are willing to say that this is a mistake and mismanagement, and that they can manage it better, they certainly have the right to do so, and they can strike it out; but I think there is a good reason for it; and I do not regard as of much consequence the objection that, although it is an additional appropriation, it is made in a bill which is technically a deficiency bill. If it be a mere question of name, I do not think that is sufficient to put the Department to the additional inconvenience to which it would be exposed if we should delay the appropriation until the general bill is passed. How do we know when it will be passed? We have known them to be delayed until August; and we are told that, after August, the favorable season for transportation is gone. We know that over the road to Utah, and in that climate, the season for transportation is limited. We cannot send supplies in the winter; and it is therefore proper, if we are to concentrate so many troops in that valley, that we should send forward the supplies as speedily as we can. If, however, the Senate should disapprove of that policy, and should determine to prevent that concentration, they can do so by law, but in no other way that I know of.

Mr. STUART. Only a word, sir, upon the argument of the necessity growing out of the season of transportation. I objected to appropriations being made in this bill for 1859 and 1860, and especially for 1860. How does the honorable chairman answer me? He says there is a season for transportation at which season the transportation can be made much cheaper. That is undoubtedly true; but when is it? It commences about the 1st of May. Here is 1858. On the 1st of May 1858, you may make your transportation; and the deficiencies which are reported here, and for which Congress appropriates, are for the service of the year ending June 30, 1858. Now, sir, go forward, and there comes the spring of 1859, one year from next May. Then commences the next season for transportation. It varies a few days, perhaps, either side of the 1st of May, but that is the usual time. Congress will be in session again next December and can make an appropriation in time to commence transportation in May, 1859. Then comes the third year, in May, 1860; and Congress will again be in session in December, before that time; and yet in this bill are appropriations running to the 30th of June, 1860. There is no earthly necessity for it.

It is not, therefore, as the honorable chairman suggests, merely a question of the name of the bill in which you place it, but it is very nearly an infringement of the Constitution of the United States; for the very clause which gives to Congress the power to raise and support armies says that appropriations for that purpose shall not be made for more than two years. If you count the actual years, beginning to-day, and suppose this bill passes to-day, you would infringe the Constitution; but perhaps that would not be a fair construction. It would commence at the end of this fiscal year, and then it would be just two years; but there is no necessity for it in order to avail yourself of the season for transportation. There is objection to appropriating large sums of money in advance; for, as has been argued here, if we appropriate money now for 1860, that does not go into the surplus fund until 1862, and thus you would run four years ahead; and that would be a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States. In any event, I confess I do not see the necessity.

If the vote is about to be taken on the amendment, I suggest to the Senator from Maine that I shall move to strike out all of his first amendment, after the word "appropriated," in line six, and insert the provision which I have read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if he objects at all to the provision that they shall not make the contracts during this session of Congress?

Mr. STUART. I stated that I preferred for that purpose the amendment which had been drawn up by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall object to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland as applicable to contracts made in the recess of Congress; but I cannot accede to the propriety of allowing the Departments to make contracts in this way during the session. Now I wish to say one word more in regard to these contracts. Senators perhaps do not consider that there is a large amount of money, as a general rule, on hand. We appropriated in the first place (and that is not touched by my amendment) all that was supposed to be necessary for the service of the Army for this year. Upon that, contracts may be made. There is no prohibition for making contracts so far as the money goes. It is only when the cases arise which they call contingencies—when that money is expended—that I object to making contracts. So long as it lasts, on the basis of that, contracts may be made in California and elsewhere. That is not prohibited. All I wish to prohibit is this: that while Congress is in session they shall not make contracts without funds or specifications, and when it is not in session that they shall not make them unless under particular provisions made for guarding the Treasury.

Mr. STUART. I will suggest to the Senator, so that he may answer it if he thinks proper, that such an emergency as has been alluded to here, the necessity for the prompt movement of troops, would be just as great during the session of Congress as in the vacation; and the Senator knows that the tardiness with which Congress necessarily moves in the passage of appropriation bills might prevent the prompt execution of a necessary order. I think the exigency would be as great practically during the session of Congress as during the vacation; and I repeat I do not believe you can reach this more perfectly than by providing for a direct, prompt, and specific accountability.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One word in reply. Emergency is a very general term. There may be a great one or a small one. If there is any severe emergency, one that involves the well-being of the country, it is certainly an imputation on us to suppose that we will not furnish money just as quick as it is asked for, and pass everything that is needful. Suppose there was a rebellion, or an invasion, or anything of that sort, which called for prompt, decisive, and decided action by the Government. The Senator supposes that, while the President and Executive Departments might be supposed to move quickly, here we stand, perfectly deaf and blind. If it is an emergency that calls for anything of that sort, it is to be presumed we shall all feel alike on that subject, and can move quick enough.

Mr. HALE. I want to state a fact, in answer to the last suggestion of the Senator from Michigan. I think, in 1846, while Congress was in session here, one of these emergencies arose "by the act of Mexico." We got into a war "by the act of Mexico," and the President communicated that fact to Congress. I believe that Congress, in less time than it would take to read the documents through, passed the appropriations that the Executive called for. I was not a member of Congress at that time; but I know complaint was made then, that they were in such hot haste that they would not even let the documents be read through, and the President got everything he wanted, vastly more than he ought to have had, and got it very quick—immediately, instantly.

The great mischief of our times is legislation for emergencies. You will always have them as long as you provide for them. The true way is to legislate for peace, and consider war as improbable, at least so far as conferring extensive discretion on the Executive is concerned. The Administration will never be in want of an emergency as long as Brigham Young lives, that is certain; they can have it at any time. We should not consider, and should not look at the question in that point of view. The experience and history of the country shows that, even when an emergency comes by the extraordinary blundering of the Administration, as Mr. Calhoun said the Mexican war came, Congress are prompt, too prompt, to provide for it. It is a false, an unsafe, and unsound doctrine to be conferring extraordinary discretion, to be exercised in fact without any discretion, as we see it has been, because it is possible we may stumble into war. In regard to the suggestion the honorable Senator from Michigan has made, the amendment has been divided, so that we can have a vote on his proposition, and then on the other. Let us have a vote on the first branch first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Mason.) The first question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOUSTON. I withdraw that amendment. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maine; and at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire it will be divided. The vote will first be taken upon the first branch of that amendment, in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year, shall be used for or applied to the service of any other year, nor be transferred or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Schuchman, Slidell, Toombs, Wright, and Yates—21.

So it was agreed to; and the question recurred on the second branch of Mr. FESSENDEN's amendment.

Mr. STUART. I move, instead of the second branch of that amendment, what I send to the Clerk's desk. This is drawn in the form of a section; but the words "and be it further enacted," can be omitted.

Mr. HALE. I raise a question of order. I am not versed in the rules; but I hardly think it is in order to amend a proposition while we are taking a vote on it. The vote has been ordered to be taken on this amendment, and the yeas and nays have been called on one branch of it. I asked for a division of the question, and the yeas and nays have been taken upon one branch of the amendment. The amendment was only divided; and I ask whether an amendment can be offered to it in this stage of the case, while we are voting upon it?

Mr. STUART. The effect of the division is to divide the amendment into separate propositions. This portion of it now stands as an independent proposition, subject to be amended in any form that it could have been if it had never been connected with the proposition upon which we have just voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that an amendment to the amendment is still in order.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This branch of the amendment of the Senator from Maine is now an independent proposition and can be amended. The Chair was of the impression, and stated yesterday, that after the yeas and nays had been ordered upon a proposition, it was not in order then to amend it, but he will not act upon that impression as the temporary occupant of the chair; and unless the question is made by some Senator he will receive this amendment as in order.

Mr. STUART. My amendment is, as a substitute for that branch of the amendment of the Senator from Maine on which we are now about to vote, to insert:

And that whenever, hereafter, contracts shall be made by the Secretary of War, by virtue of the sixth section of the act of 1820, chapter 52, he shall, if Congress be in session at the time, promptly report to both Houses thereof the reasons for making such contract, stating fully all the facts and circumstances which, in his judgment, rendered such contract necessary. If Congress be not in session at the time of making such contract, he shall, at the commencement of the next session, make such report to both Houses. And no such contract shall be made hereafter except in case of pressing exigency.

Mr. HALE. The amendment to the amendment is not amendable; but I wish to suggest to the Senator who moves it, that the exception in the sixth section of the act of May 1, 1820, relates to both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; but his amendment simply applies to the Secretary of War. I suppose he means to include both.

Mr. STUART. Perhaps it would suit the sense of the Senate better to withdraw my amendment for the present, and let the vote be taken on that of the Senator from Maine; and if it be voted down, then to offer mine as an independent proposition.

Mr. HALE. I think that would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the second branch of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, in these words:

"And no contract for Army supplies or service of any description shall be hereafter made during the session of Congress except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—24.

So it was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the third and last branch of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, in these words:

"Nor shall any such contract be made hereafter, at any time, without previous public advertisement for proposals respecting the same."

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask a single question of the chairman of the Finance Committee. Does he not think that is the law now?

Mr. HUNTER. There is a doubt about it. It has been construed very differently by the Departments.

Mr. HALE. I knew it had been so construed; we have no evidence of that on the table before us; but I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee what his opinion was as to the law now.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it is doubtful whether the same necessity which required these contracts to be made ahead of appropriations would not require them to be made sometimes without notice. I do not see how you can distinguish between the public services which are bought in open market, as they are called, and those obtained under a contract. For instance, what is this contract in relation to transportation from St. Louis to Leavenworth? Is it a purchase in open market, or was it a contract they must advertise for? They have considered it either to be a purchase in open market, or else that this particular species of contract did not require advertisement.

Mr. HALE. I made myself exceedingly unfortunate in asking the question, or else the Senator has in answering it. That contract is one, but there are three others—the contract for beef, for wagons, &c.; and the question was not whether it was expedient or proper, but whether the law of 1809, which requires that these contracts shall be advertised, is not now the law of the land.

Mr. HUNTER. That law is a law of the land except so far as it was modified by the law of 1820. I say there is a doubt in regard to that.

Mr. HALE. Then we had better make it certain—that is all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As it at present stands, with the other portion struck out, if this amendment should be passed in its exact words, it would not read right. Of course it can be put into the proper words afterward.

Mr. STUART. Just strike out the words "nor shall any such," and insert "and no."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps it will need some modification. It can be put right after the vote has been taken, if adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will suggest, in relation to this amendment, that there is a class of contracts in regard to transportation, and in nineteen cases out of twenty it would defeat the whole object to require an advertisement for sixty days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The provision for sixty days' notice is not here at all. It does not say how long notice shall be given. That is left to the discretion of the Department.

Mr. BENJAMIN. But it requires previous advertisement. There is nobody to do the work but the railroads. The railroads have a monopoly of the transportation where there are railroad routes.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by adding "except for transportation."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a very material thing of the whole matter. That costs more than anything else.

Mr. HALE. Well, let us cut off something, if we can.

Mr. CAMERON. The exception should be limited to transportation by railroad.

Mr. HALE. My amendment is to add "except for transportation by railroads."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurred on the third branch of Mr. FESSENDEN's amendment as amended.

Mr. STUART. I suggest to the honorable Senator that it would be better to put the amendment in shape. It seems to me that the original amendment has been divided beyond what it should have been; but as it stands now, if adopted, it will not make any sense at all.

Mr. HALE. We can put in the prepositions afterwards.

Mr. STUART. But it says, "nor shall any such contract;" and, as the section now stands, there is no preceding language that alludes to any contract.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what I stated. There must be a modification.

Mr. STUART. It should be so modified as to apply to contracts for Army supplies or services of any description: "Nor shall contracts for Army supplies, or of service of any description, except for transportation," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Put it in this shape: "and no contract."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment will be harmonious by striking out the words, "nor shall any such contract be made hereafter at any time," and inserting, "and no contract for Army supplies or service of any description shall be made."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am endeavoring to do so now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will then read, "that no contract for Army supplies," &c., with the exception which was put in on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire. Insert the first line and a half of the amendment which has been voted down, and strike out the first line of the amendment now pending, and that will make it all harmonious.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been modified by the mover, and will be read as modified.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

And no contract for Army supplies or service of any description, except for transportation on railroads, shall be made hereafter, at any time, without previous public advertisement for proposals respecting the same.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STUART. That disposes of the whole amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair presumes that the question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. STUART. It was simply divided, which made it distinct propositions. One was adopted, and the other two voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will acquiesce in that suggestion, but he thought otherwise.

Mr. STUART. I now offer the proposition which I submitted a little while ago, and I offer it as a distinct section. I stated that it was prepared by the honorable Senator from Maryland with a good deal of care yesterday, and I think it is in a form that cannot, in any event, embarrass the operations of the Army, but will secure more prompt and accurate accountability. It is:

And be it further enacted, That whenever, hereafter, contracts shall be made by the Secretaries of War or Navy, by virtue of the sixth section of the act of May, 1820, chapter 52, he shall, if Congress be in session at the time, promptly report to both Houses thereof the reasons for making such contract, stating fully all the facts and circumstances which, in his judgment, rendered such contract necessary. If Congress be not in session at the time of making such contract, he shall, at the commencement of the next session, make such report to both Houses. And no such contract shall be made hereafter except in cases of pressing exigency.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator whether it would not be necessary to modify the terms of that amendment a little more. He says that no contract shall be made by the Secretary of War or Navy; but these contracts, in point of fact, are not made by those Departments, but are made, as for instance here, by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. STUART. The language includes that clearly.

Mr. HALE. If it does, I am content.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is another amendment, that I laid on the table yesterday, which I now offer; but I wish first to modify it.

Mr. HUNTER. How much of the bill is it proposed to strike out?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is, after the word "Army," in line thirty, to strike out all down to line one hundred and eighteen, on the sixth page. That is the way my amendment is printed. I propose to modify it by saying "down to line one hundred and sixteen." I see that, by including down to line one hundred and eighteen, I should strike out the provision for subsistence. Although I have some propositions to make in regard to that, I wish to make them separately. I wish to strike out down to line one hundred and sixteen. I also modify my amendment by increasing the appropriation for deficiencies for transportation, in the year ending June 30, 1858, from $500,000 to $1,000,000. My amendment, as modified, is to strike out all the military appropriations in the original bill between line thirty, on page 2, and line one hundred and sixteen, on page 6, and insert:

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1857, $279,377 57.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, in the year ending June 30, 1857, $129,860 20.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1857, $751,487 15.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for barracks and quarters in the year ending June 30, 1857, $67,954 39.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $300,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $60,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1858, $1,000,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for constructing barracks, and other expenses incident to the same and to quarters for the troops, and to store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, during the year ending June 30, 1858, $30,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the purchase of horses necessary to be purchased in the year ending June 30, 1858, for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts, $100,000.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Senator from Maine proposes to appropriate $3,718,000 for deficiencies. Is that the amount?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not so much as that. It is about a million short of that. I will explain precisely the ground on which I put it.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I remarked a few moments ago, the original bill that has come into the Senate is so drawn that while in fact it is intended to provide for deficiencies in the year 1857, and for supposed deficiencies in the year 1858, it also provides for proposed expenditures in the succeeding years 1859 and 1860, and it is so framed that it is impossible to make a distinction between the two. It is so drawn that we cannot vote separately on these separate objects, for or against them. It is also founded on another object, and that is developed in the document which I have here, No. 22 of the House Miscellaneous Documents, in which the Quartermaster General states—the Secretary does not state anything at all about it—that he desires to provide for certain enumerated deficiencies in the year 1857, and for certain probable deficiencies in 1858, including in those deficiencies all that will be necessary in the present year for the Army as it stands now with the present number of our troops in Utah. That is one object; and another object is (and that makes very much the largest part of the appropriations) to provide for transporting to Utah another very large body of troops to operate there, and to provide for the supplies necessary for them during about twenty months from this period.

I desire, for the reasons I have before stated, to divide these appropriations. In the first place, I will say to the chairman that I have no very particular squeamishness about deficiency bills, or about putting into a deficiency bill what may be necessary to put in at the time, provided it is absolutely essential and does not involve any violation of principle. But what I wish to do is to bring this question distinctly before the Senate, to see whether the Senate will, at this period of the session, not only justify the preparations that have been made to send an army to Utah consisting of between five and six thousand men, but will also provide for supporting that army in Utah for a year after the expiration of this fiscal year, or more, in the present state of our information. With a design to settle that question, and also to bring before the Senate directly whether it will, in advance of any necessity at the present time, make that provision, I have proposed these amendments.

Now I will state to the Senator and to the Senate what I propose. The provision made in the amendment I have suggested with regard to the deficiencies of the year 1857, is precisely what is stated in the document to which I have referred, as needed by the Quartermaster General. With reference to these deficiencies of 1857, there can be no dispute at all. The next provisions that I have made in the amendment are for the supposed deficiencies in the year ending June 30, 1858; and with reference to the sums the Quartermaster General supposes to be necessary for them, I have no means of judging any further than that he has given the estimates, and on those estimates I rely. I change them only in one particular. He estimates for transportation in the year 1858, the sum of $2,000,000. That I have struck down to $1,000,000. I have not interfered with the supposed deficiencies of 1858 in any other particular, but left them just as stated by the Quartermaster General.

The reason why I have reduced that item of transportation one half is this: he proposes as a deficiency in 1858 the transportation that is necessary to be incurred before the end of this fiscal year, not only for the troops that are in Utah now, but for the troops that he proposes to send there. It is impossible, of course, to come to an accurate conclusion about it; but if we refuse to appropriate the present time for this proposed large increase of force, one half the amount that is stated as necessary for the year 1858 will unquestionably be enough to cover all that is needed for the transportation of the Army. That will certainly be enough if we do not undertake to transport the large increase of the Army and the large increase of supplies and stores necessary to maintain them. That is the only difference. I have not struck out any of the other amounts estimated by the Quartermaster General. That is the only item in which I have made a reduction on the principle that we may very well postpone all the supplies for the year 1859, and for the year 1860, until we come to act upon the general appropriation bill of this session, because there is a provision here made for as much as can possibly be started, in my judgment, in the year 1858. Reasoning upon ordinary principles, even from the facts that are given to us, it would not be necessary to go any further than I propose. By this, we should put in the hands of the Department all the money that is necessary to provide for the Army as it stands, with the number of troops at present located in Utah. That is the simple principle on which I have prepared the amendment so as to test these questions.

While I propose that, I do not undertake to say that it will not be necessary to provide in the general appropriation bill within a few weeks for this increased force; nor do I undertake to say that it will be necessary. What I say is, simply, that at present we have no information before us, in my judgment, which would justify an appropriation of so very large a sum of money in advance, in this deficiency bill. The Senator from Virginia, I suppose, will see precisely what effect this would have. Suppose the amendment which has been adopted had not passed, and should not finally prevail: if you undertook to vote this very large sum of money, extended, as it would be extended by the existing law, over several years, the result would be that if, as we believe, and as we have reason to think, the difficulties in Utah should be terminated without any trouble, soon after this Congress adjourns, in the course of the summer, it would leave an enormous appropriation in the hands of the Administration for Army purposes—it would pass out of our control, at any rate, for the present—for them to use just as they pleased.

Let me be understood. Pass this bill as it was reported in the first place, without the amendment which the Senate has not yet finally adopted, but has adopted in Committee of the Whole, with regard to the transfer of appropriation, and you appropriate on account of the supposed Utah war, some eight million dollars to the use of the Army; and what would be the result? We must make, at the end of the session, the usual and the ordinary appropriations for the Army. These are deficiencies, or extra appropriations, on account of the supposed Utah service. Then, when we have made the ordinary appropriations for the use of the Army, and Congress has adjourned, if, as is most probable, and ought to be the case, the Utah difficulties are settled without any further trouble, (and commissioners have gone out there in order to do it,) the result is, that here is an enormous appropriation left in the hands of the Administration, for which it can have no use connected with the regular service of the Army, and which would enable it to do as it pleased. Although, perhaps we might not anticipate any very great danger or difficulty, yet it is contrary to all reasonable principles of appropriation, especially for Army purposes, to do such a thing.

The Senator will see that if the amendment which has been adopted in committee should be sustained by the Senate, it renders it absolutely necessary that there should be a more specific appropriation in the bill. As it stands now, all these appropriations are in a lump, under the different heads of expenditure. For instance, for transportation, in one head, the appropriation is over five million dollars. It does not distinguish between one year and another. Therefore, if we make the appropriation in general terms, it stands as an appropriation for the present year; and standing as an appropriation for the present year, with the amendment that has been adopted, there could not be a dollar of it used after this year. Hence, if that amendment is to be sustained, it becomes absolutely necessary that the appropriation for different years should be specifically made in specific sums for the service of those years; and it was in reference to that necessity, if my first amendment was adopted, that I prepared this one, covering specifically the ascertained deficiencies for the year 1857, and the probable deficiencies for 1858.

These are the simple principles on which the amendment was prepared. Now, I have to say in regard to the other branch of the case, that, in my judgment, at the present time Congress would not be justified in making the enormous appropriation proposed for the increase of the Army in Utah. It is said that we have difficulties in Utah. Well, sir, it is one of those emergencies that an Administration may at any time create. We have heard a great deal here of emergencies; and it was in reference to these emergencies which an Administration may make at any time with its control of the Army, that I proposed the other amendments, one of which has been adopted, and the other rejected by the Senate. How has this emergency been brought about? Let us look back at its history.

The difficulties with Utah, as has been said over and over again, existed under the preceding Administration, for two or three years. They were just as bad at any time for a year before the close of the former Administration, as they have been at any time since, until the army now under the command of Colonel Johnston reached its present quarters. What did the Administration do? No claim, no demand whatever, was made upon the last Congress for any increased appropriation on account of the difficulties with Utah. That Congress and that Administration did not apprehend that there would be a necessity for any increased military expenditures for that particular reason; and yet, when the present Administration came into power with that state of things under which the former Administration had rested, and under which the country had rested, it proceeded to organize an expedition to Utah, which would necessarily involve the expenditure of an enormous amount of money.

That is the first step it took. Well, sir, how did it undertake to do that? There is a little peculiarity about it. We hear it now urged on all sides that, in order to deal with this subject with any degree of economy, Congress must move now; it must not hesitate a month; it must not hesitate two weeks; the time must be well spent, in order to avoid the necessity for a great expenditure of money. Why, sir, when that argument is advanced here, let us advert to the fact that the expedition which started last year for Utah, did not leave Leavenworth until some time in August—I do not know the exact period, but it was at a period of the year when it was impossible for it to reach its destination, and when anybody could have foreseen what must be the inevitable result, that there would be an immense increase of the expenses of transportation, for the reason that the grass would be gone, and for other reasons operating on such expeditions. It ought also to have been foreseen that the troops must go into winter quarters under the most unfavorable circumstances; and that that movement would involve the necessity of forwarding large amounts of supplies at a vastly increased cost, when nothing in the world could be accomplished during that year; and when, for any purpose of the expedition itself, it might have remained just as well at home until Congress met, and the subject had been submitted to Congress; and then, if started at all, it might have gone at the earliest period of this season, when the proper provision could have been made for it by an appropriation of money. Yet, sir, this Administration undertakes, in the face of these facts, to make the emergency; to send this large force out in connection with its civil officers; starting at a period of the year when it was impossible for them to reach their destination, when nothing could be done; and when, with the most ordinary foresight in the world, anybody might have seen that it would occasion a vastly increased expenditure to no purpose whatever.

Well now, sir, that being done, what is the next step? We are not told by the Administration that there is any war with Utah. The President notifies us of difficulties, but he advises nothing. We all recollect the debate at the first part of this session, when five regiments were called for to increase the Army. We called in this body, over and over again, upon the friends of any measure for the increase of the Army, to say whether it was on account of the Mormon difficulties, and we did not get the answer that it was, and we have not had it up to this day. We have had no recommendation from the President to increase the forces on account of the difficulties in Utah. We have had no estimates from the Department direct with reference to the difficulties in Utah. We have had no recommendation; we have had no information; and, so far as I am acquainted with the subject, I have seen nothing upon the tables of the Senate, from any quarter whatever, to show us that there was any occasion to dispatch a large increased force on account of these difficulties. On the contrary, what has been the course? Peace commissioners have been sent out lately to see whether they cannot negotiate on the subject.

Under these circumstances, having provided all that is necessary to pay the deficiencies of 1857, all that is necessary to furnish transportation and supplies for 1858—and they may start them as soon as they please under the provisions which we shall have made by this amendment—it is not too much to say that we can wait for a few weeks, until near the adjournment of Congress, before we put into the hands of the Administration four or five million dollars additional, which they may not have occasion to use at all; and which, when we have put it into their hands, they may use at their own pleasure, unless the amendment I previously proposed, and which has been adopted, should eventually be made part of the bill. That, to be sure, would prevent it, and that is the only thing which would prevent it.

Now, Mr. President, one word more, for I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate upon this matter. I wish, if possible, to discourage and discountenance in every possible way that we can do it, with any degree of safety to the interests of the country, this habit of the Executive of this Government taking the responsibility of making war. I believe the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] the other day, in a speech he made here, stated that it was in the power of the Executive to make a war with a foreign nation at any time, in spite of Congress. Perhaps it is; but if it is so, if it is in his power, it is time that the Congress of the United States shall say that he will not be sustained in availing himself of power of that description by any vote of theirs, by being supplied with the means of carrying on expeditions of that description, illegally and unconstitutionally undertaken, unless when it comes to a case of necessity, when by the unwise and rash and wicked actions of the executive Government, our troops have been placed in a position where it is necessary to take care of them—our fellow-citizens in a position where they call for our aid to extricate them from the difficulties in which they are placed. Unless we come to cases of necessity of that description let us discountenance it by every possible method we can use to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senator from Maine will pardon me. I think he has stated my proposition too broadly. If I recollect correctly, I said that the President of the United States could so conduct our foreign relations as to compel us either to go to war or disgrace the nation—one or the other—leaving no alternative but that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not pretend to cite the language of the Senator. I attempted to get his idea as near as I recollected it; and I think what he has now said amounts to about the same thing, if he will excuse me for saying so. It is perhaps in the power of the Administration so to conduct our foreign relations. We know that the Administration may, in fact, involve the country in actual hostilities by reason of the power it has over the Army and Navy. If there be such a power, I protest against its exercise, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution; for the Constitution leaves the war-making power with Congress alone, and appropriations for carrying on war with Congress alone. If that power does exist in the Administration—and I am not prepared to dispute the fact that it may—the greater is the necessity imposed upon us, according to my judgment, in all such cases, to hesitate before we countenance it, unless, as I stated before, where the honor of the country and the safety of our fellow-citizens absolutely require that we should take the matter as it stands, and yield to the necessity which has been imposed upon us. It is with that view that I suggest these amendments, which go simply to confine the appropriations to actual existing deficiencies, and leave the matter of the large proposed increase to this expedition to be decided upon by us at a future time whenever the necessity arises, and which will be soon enough for all the purposes required.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I have had an addition made of the items of the Senator's amendment, and I find that he has reduced the estimates for deficiencies more than a million. The sum total of his proposition is $2,218,679. The estimate for deficiencies was $3,718,679.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are not all deficiencies.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Maine has undertaken to do what I think it is impossible for him to accomplish with the information before us. He has undertaken to discriminate between these expenditures which are fairly to be charged to the deficiencies which would have occurred if there had been no Utah expedition, from those which have been incurred on account of that expedition, or rather from those which will be incurred hereafter, if we sanction the further movement of the troops.

Now, sir, if we look at the estimate of General Jesup, we find that his estimate for the deficiencies for the fiscal year 1856-7, is $1,228,679 31. We find that is the deficiency for the last fiscal year for the Army, as it was on the 24th of December, 1857. The deficiencies for the present year, in addition to the last year, would be in the whole, $3,718,679 31. Of this there is an estimate of $2,000,000 for transportation. The Senator from Maine says he has cut that down arbitrarily, on the supposition that $1,000,000 would be sufficient for the deficiencies, if you were to deduct that portion expended for Utah; but General Jesup informs us on page 4 of the document, that out of the $1,800,000 appropriated in last year's bill for the Army, as it was without the expedition to Utah, they have already expended $1,768,000 for the service in Utah, thus leaving but a few thousand dollars in this branch of the service for the regular Army. It was estimated it would take for the regular Army, without this expedition, $1,800,000; and most of it, all with the exception of a few thousand dollars, has already been expended in the Utah expedition. The Senator says that $1,000,000 ought to be enough. He has thus reduced the estimate of the quartermaster's department in regard to what will be wanted for the transportation of the Army as it stood before this expedition, some eight hundred thousand dollars. But, Mr. President, how is the gentleman to discriminate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe he is mistaken about that. He does not read that rightly. It leaves this $1,000,000 for outside supplies. The Quartermaster General says:

"The appropriation for the present fiscal year is $1,800,000, of which amount $1,768,486 68 is required to cover the expenses already incurred in the transportation of military supplies and the baggage of the troops now in Utah Territory, and which must be incurred." &c.

So he calculates that $1,700,000 will cover all that is necessary, and he only wants $1,000,000 for the rest of the Army.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us see. He says:

"The appropriation for the present fiscal year is $1,800,000, of which amount $1,768,486 68 is required to cover the expenses already incurred in the transportation of military supplies and the baggage of the troops now in Utah Territory, and which must be incurred to place them in the condition in which they would have been, provided no disasters had befallen them, or who befall them, this winter, including the sum of $205,842 03 which will be due the contractors." &c.

That is to say, $1,768,000 out of this $1,800,000 is necessary for the troops which are already posted at Fort Bridger, and on the way—a necessity which must be met, an object for which they must apply the necessary money. He says, then, that nearly the whole of the appropriation made for the transportation of the regular Army is necessary for that purpose; but it appears from his estimate of the year before, that $1,800,000 was necessary for the Army, without regard to the Utah movement. The Senator has reduced that arbitrarily, as I said before, $800,000.

But, Mr. President, it is to be remembered that this estimate was made in January. Since that time, as I said before, they have been moving troops from all quarters of the Union towards this point; they have been moving them at great expense. Debts have been incurred even in this fiscal year to accomplish that object. What becomes of them? The Senator makes no provision for them. On the contrary, he does not even make the provision which the Quartermaster General says would be necessary on the supposition that there had been no movement.

Now, sir, this is the difficulty in which we are placed: if we were to endeavor to accomplish the object which the Senator from Maine desires, we have not the means of ascertaining how much has been expended on the Utah expedition up to this time. We have a partial estimate in regard to that up to the 14th of January, I think, the date on which this report was sent. We have an estimate of what is supposed to be necessary in order to furnish the entire movement, in order to furnish all the troops who are ordered there with supplies and transportation. Is the Senator prepared to say that he will not appropriate for so much debt as has already been contracted in order to move these troops? They were moved in pursuance of law. The President had the right to move them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am willing to pay all that.

Mr. HUNTER. But the Senator has not provided for it. On the contrary, it is manifest that his proposition, if adopted, will leave a large debt existing on that score, because we know numerous troops have been moving at vast expense since this estimate was made for that very purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator if he will allow me, [Mr. HUNTER. Certainly,] that that was a calculation of mine, and I am perfectly willing to allow for everything that applies properly to make good the deficiencies for the service for this year; and if it is necessary to put in $2,000,000, put it in. I supposed it would not be necessary. All I wanted to cut down was the large additional appropriations for the succeeding year. I am not strenuous about the additional million for this year.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it not manifest that it will take not only that additional million, but more, in order to meet the expenditures that have been incurred?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary says not.

Mr. HUNTER. Do we not know that five thousand troops—I believe more—have been moving? Do we not know that General Scott thought it necessary to collect many troops, in the event that there might be war when the Governor got to Utah. And is it not certain that the expense of moving and supplying those troops is far beyond that estimate for deficiencies, which the Quartermaster General has made on the supposition that there had been no expedition to Utah? These are debts, and debts which must be provided for; and, as I said before, if the object of the Senator be to confine the appropriation to what has been already expended on that purpose, and to say that no more shall be applied to any other purpose than to support the troops in the valley of Salt Lake, if they are there, and I suppose they are—if he means to do that, he can only accomplish his object by providing by law, in terms, that no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for any other service.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 108.

But, sir, I ask, is the Senate willing to take the responsibility thus of striking in the dark? Is it willing to say that no more troops shall be sent forward for the purpose of reinforcing those who have gone ahead? Is it willing to say there is no danger of an attack on the part of the Mormons on these men, who will soon be in their midst? Is it prepared to say that this military necessity, which, in the opinion of the Commanding General and of the proper authorities, exists, does not in fact exist? Sir, I think we should pause long upon the information which we have, before we take the responsibility of acting upon any such principle. It has been said that we ought not to sanction it, because the President has plunged us into war without the authority and sanction of Congress. How has he plunged us in war? Where is the war? Has he declared any war against the Mormons? Has he proposed any war? He has done more than this: he has proposed that the legitimate authorities, the Governor and judges, and those constituting the government in Utah, shall be accompanied by such a force as to prevent any military opposition on the part of the Mormons. He has evinced a disposition, in the first place, to maintain the authority and the laws of the United States at all hazards. Does not the country sustain him in it? He has supposed that in order to do this, it was necessary to concentrate so many troops in that valley as to prevent any hostile demonstration on the part of these deluded people. Are we quite sure that there was not wisdom in this? It is true, if there was no danger, here was an unnecessary expense. But suppose there is danger, (and it seems to have been thought by persons who are competent to judge of such affairs that there was danger,) would it not have been money well spent to have sent troops enough to overawe them, and to prevent any hostile demonstration?

Now, sir, in regard to the danger of outbreak in that Territory—I do not pretend to speak, I am not called upon here to speak, in regard to it. I know that these troops have been concentrated under authority of law; that they have been concentrated there by him who had the power to do it; and the whole question with me is, whether I shall furnish them with supplies or not? I know that for that purpose debts have been contracted which we are bound to pay, for they were contracted under authority. Shall we provide the means of paying them or not? It is said to be uncertain how much of this debt has been contracted. I know it is uncertain; but the best information on which we can act is that which is here furnished—the estimate from the proper Department. I know not how else we are to determine. And suppose that it should turn out, after we had made this appropriation, that the Mormons were to give evidence that they were disposed to be pacific, and make no outbreak, does it follow that the Senator from Maine would be right in supposing that there would be a large surplus unnecessarily appropriated? Even if there were, is there any very great danger that it would be expended? But would there be such surplus unnecessarily appropriated? Why, sir, we could diminish the appropriations in the general bill on account of this which we have already appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose the event does not occur until the regular bill is passed?

Mr. HUNTER. We do not know when the regular bill will pass; we are obliged to speculate on events as they will probably occur; we know that if these supplies are necessary—and the probability is that they will be, for the troops have gone there—it will be better to authorize them to be put there now than to wait until the proper season for transportation is over. We know that; and if it be better, I cannot see any mischief that is to arise out of making the appropriation a month or two ahead, if it enables us to avail ourselves of this favorable season, because it is plain we may diminish by that amount the appropriations in the regular bill. We are told by the estimate from the Commissary of Subsistence that he will recommend that the appropriation in the regular bill be diminished by a large portion of this amount—more than one half of it, I believe.

This whole question is, then, whether we will appropriate now, or a little while hence. If we appropriate now, we enable the Government to conduct the service more economically. That is the amount of it. In regard to the debts, if they are incurred, we cannot help it; we are obliged to pay them, and the Government will pay them, and nothing is saved by postponing them, and refusing to make the necessary appropriations now. If, however, the Senator believes that no more troops are necessary than those now stationed in this Salt Lake Valley, his proper course would be, as I said before, to move an amendment which would forbid the sending forward any more to reinforce them. He could accomplish his object in that way; but I do not see that he can accomplish the object of preventing the liability in the mode he proposes. He will only postpone the time of payment, by which nothing, that I can see, is to be gained, either for the purposes of economy or good government.

Now, sir, if he is willing to say, and the Senate should say, that they believe this expedition to be unnecessary, that they are willing to trust the troops who are there, and trust the Government to the protection of those troops, believing there will be no necessity to add any more, let them do it, let them take that responsibility. Then they will be justified in cutting down the appropriations; but, as long as you leave the Executive authority to put them there, and when you know that he intends to put them there, when he has declared that intention, I do not see what is to be gained by cutting down the appropriations, as I said before, except to postpone the time of payment, and force them to buy on credit, instead of paying cash, and thus to increase the cost of everything that is consumed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia, is he willing to acquiesce in the decision of the Senate in the amendment they have already agreed to, to limit these appropriations to the present fiscal year?

Mr. HUNTER. I am not, for one. I think it a very bad amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then there is the same necessity for limiting the appropriations as if no such amendment had been agreed to. If I could be satisfied that the Senate would confine these appropriations as the amendment already adopted in Committee of the Whole does, I should be willing to give a little more indulgence. I have no sort of objection to giving a margin, if it is not to be spread over three or four years. I was in hopes that the Senator from Virginia would agree to this for the sake of getting over this difficulty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is one portion of the argument of the Senator from Virginia, or a suggestion of his, which I desire to answer. We are called upon to pass an appropriation bill called a deficiency bill, involving, I believe, about ten millions of money. Eight million dollars of this amount, or, to speak more exactly, $7,900,000, are for the support of the Army—a very large sum, a sum which should attract the attention of Congress, and will, I doubt not, attract the attention of the country.

This large deficiency has its origin in what I conceive to be an assumption of authority unwarranted by law or the Constitution on the part of the President. I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia, that these troops have been lawfully concentrated in the Rocky Mountains; and if an appropriation bill of this character can pass Congress, and the President of the United States has the authority which is contended for, then the Executive is a despot, and may control the liberties of the country in spite of Congress or anybody else, unless the people in their might shall rise and overturn the Government. The Constitution of the United States is not worth the paper upon which it is written if these assumptions of authority are to be sustained, and if the Executive rightly construes it. I should like the Senator from Virginia to show the law by virtue of which the President has assembled this army in the Rocky Mountains. No such law has been shown. We had this subject up in the discussion of the Kansas question, and the President was charged with usurpation of power in the assembling and use made of the army in Kansas, and the charge was never answered. But to-day the Senator from Virginia tells us that this is rightly done. Where is the law for it?

The President of the United States is made the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. I admit that; but he cannot use the Army and Navy at his discretion. He is as much limited to, and bound by, the action of Congress in the use of the Army and Navy, as he is in the use of any other power he may exercise under the direction of Congress. It is his duty, I know, to see that the laws are faithfully executed; but he cannot do that in any other mode than that which Congress prescribes. We have a law punishing offenders who violate the laws of the United States—punishing them criminally, in many instances. It is the duty of the President to see that the law is faithfully executed. Would the Senator from Virginia contend that the President could arrest a man for murder in the Indian country, and hang him? He has just as much authority to do it, as he has to use the Army outside of the limit prescribed by law.

As long ago as 1793, when the Congress of the United States authorized certain cities upon the sea-board to be fortified, such as Charleston, Boston, and New York, the act authorized the President of the United States to garrison the forts that were constructed, with troops. Under the general power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, it was then considered that he had not authority to place a garrison in a port without authority of Congress; and, if you will look into the laws, you will find that the use of the army by the President as Commander-in-Chief is limited by acts of Congress. Congress authorizes a fort to be built, and directs it to be garrisoned by troops. The President of the United States is the officer that exercises this authority granted him by the act of Congress. As Commander-in-Chief, he commands the troops. Congress raises a regiment to defend the frontiers of Texas against the Indians, and Congress has no authority to put the command of that regiment under any other officer than the President of the United States; but the President has no power to take that regiment, raised for the purpose of defending the frontiers of Texas, and use it as a posse comitatus to protect a Governor sent to Utah.

By looking into the statutes, it will be found that in certain cases the President is authorized to employ the Army to garrison forts; he may employ the Army for the purpose of enforcing acts in the protection of Indians upon their reservations; he is authorized in certain cases to use the Army for the purpose of expelling intruders from the public lands; he is authorized to use the Army in making roads, under certain circumstances; but where is the authority for his using the Army as an escort to the Governor of a Territory? Sir, there is no such authority. In his message to Congress, the President of the United States says that he sent this Army as a posse comitatus to accompany Governor Cumming. Sir, there is no authority for the President to use the Army as a posse comitatus, and it is a perversion of terms, and it is an absurdity to call the military power of this country a posse comitatus. What is such a posse? It is the power of the county, the civil power of the county summoned to the assistance of an executive officer to enable him to execute process, summoned to the assistance of a marshal, or a sheriff; but has your Governor any authority to execute a writ? Has the Governor of Utah, or any other Governor of a Territory, a right to summon a posse comitatus for any purpose whatever? I deny it. No such authority is given. The President has just as much right to assemble the whole Army of the United States in the city of Washington as a posse comitatus to protect himself or to overawe Congress, as he has to assemble it as a posse comitatus to accompany Governor Cumming to Utah.

The foundation of this bill lies in an assumption of power on the part of the Executive; and we are fast departing from the Constitution, and from the landmarks laid down by the fathers when we sanction this usurpation of authority. This bill appropriates many millions of money for the support of the Army—an appropriation founded in many instances not only upon the assumption of power by the Executive, but also upon the assumption of power by subordinate officers. Contracts have been made, as was shown by the Senator from Maine yesterday, without authority of law; and yet we are to appropriate money to pay them. We are to do this under the pretense, or under the reality rather, that the appropriation now made may be necessary in consequence of the condition in which the country has been brought by this unauthorized assumption of power on the part of the Executive. Sir, we are pointed to the Army, and asked if we will refuse supplies. An appeal is made to us on the part of the Administration to vote these supplies; and I will read from the organ of the Administration a few sentences to show the character of this appeal. In the Union of yesterday morning there is an article headed "Utah Expedition," which reads:

"If boys are men in miniature, then are wars anything else than unpopular; for boys read of nothing but battles, and admire no heroes but warriors. It is the misfortune of the human race to delight in the stirring events of war rather than in the tame monotony of peace. It was the theory of Hobbes that war is the natural state of mankind, and that it requires all the restraints of law, government, and society to bring about even intermittent and spasmodic periods of peace. The fame of an able statesman is only cherished by the educated and intelligent few; but the renown of a great captain is the joy of the popular heart. The populace!"

Yes, sir, "the populace"—that is the term applied to the great mass of the people of this country by the organ of the Administration—

"the populace delight in the anxious suspense of impending battle, and in the thrilling details of hard-fought engagements."

"We cannot conceive of a more barren field for the demagogue than an anti-war campaign. To cry out to the populace, after a long peace, against a new war, is the most stupid demagoguery imaginable."

In another portion of the article it is said.

"Parimony, however, is not a passion with our people, even in regard to their State expenditures, much less is it so with regard to Federal expenditures. War, on the contrary, is a passion of our populace, and on no occasions have our Corbierine demagogues sustained more humiliating overthrows than when they have blundered into an encounter with the war feeling of the country."

That, sir, is the character of the article put forth to hurry this bill through the Senate, and to induce Congress to pass an appropriation for almost eight million dollars of money as a deficiency to supply an army under circumstances not justified by the Constitution or the laws of the land; and those who oppose it are called demagogues, and the young men of the country are pointed to the renown which is to follow the successful leaders in war; and in this article the heroes are contrasted with the civilians. I know, sir, that the people of this country are ready for a necessary war—ready to defend themselves in any emergency when in the right; but I do not believe the people of this country are for war for the sake of war; nor, as this article intimates, do I believe the people of this country suppose war to be the natural state of mankind; and, while renown may follow the successful leaders in war, we should not forget that there follow in the train of war many calamities. While glory may encircle the brow of the successful captain, the tears of widows and of orphans follow in the train of war also; and we should remember that there are thousands made to suffer by its disasters while few reap its glories and benefits, so far as personal aggrandizement is concerned. The fact that war manufactures heroes, is the bait thrown out here to induce support to this bill.

I was reminded, when I read this article, of a citizen who was appealed to when the Mexican war broke out a few years ago, to know if he was in favor of the Mexican war. He replied, yes—yes, he was in favor of the Mexican war; and he was not only in favor of the Mexican war, but he was in favor of pestilence and famine too; he had opposed one war, the war of 1812, and he should never oppose another. He went for all three; and I would about as soon think of going for war, pestilence, and famine, as advocating such doctrines as are put forth here to carry this bill through Congress.

It is suggested to me by a friend that possibly the Chief Magistrate of the nation may have a little of the feeling of the citizen to whom I alluded before, who had opposed one war. He is said once to have opposed a war. I hope it is not having that effect upon him so that he is going to be for war the rest of his life, and for pestilence and famine too. I do not know but that this will lead to famine. It will certainly lead to an impoverishment of the Government, if not of the people, if the Government is to be administered and carried on as it has been for the last few years, and particularly since the present Executive came into power.

I assume, then, that to pass a bill like this is a surrender by Congress to the Executive of the nation of the control, not only of the Army without authority, but of the Treasury also. I do not say that I would not relieve the troops which have been sent forward. I believe that they should not have been sent forward; that there was no occasion for sending this army; no authority for sending it out with a civil Governor, dispatched to Utah. We had no facts before us; the country had no facts before it, to justify the sending of an army to Utah. It is true there were some vague facts brought back by Government officials who had fled from the Territory, and many of whom, perhaps, were of no better character than the Mormons themselves, of resistance to law in that Territory; but these reports, I doubt not, were greatly exaggerated; and to show the character of the reports which have been got up against the Mormons, I will read a little from a book which I have in my hand.

In Illinois we had these Mormons, and we expelled them from that State. I am not their apologist; I believe them a licentious, a vile, and a bad set of people, speaking generally of them, although, I doubt not, there are many good, honest people among them, deluded, misled, but nevertheless conscientious in their action; but they are a peculiar people; they set themselves up to be better than the rest of the world; they call themselves Saints; and the very fact that they are thus exclusive, and hold the balance of the world as Gentiles and heathens, claiming to be the Latter-Day Saints of Jesus Christ, produces collision between them and the rest of the world. If they were angels from Heaven, and came down among us and set up their peculiar tenets, differing from everybody around them, I doubt if they could live in peace in any quarter of the globe where they had any intercourse with other people.

While these people were in the State of Illinois, and after the difficulties began there, the Governor of the State, Mr. Ford, who is the author of the book I hold in my hand, went over in the vicinity of their settlements. They were settled, as everybody knows, on the Mississippi river, at the city of Nauvoo. Here is what he says as to the state of things when he went over there:

"A system of excitement and agitation was artfully planned and executed with tact. It consisted in spreading reports and rumors of the most fearful character. As examples: On the morning before my arrival at Carthage"—

Carthage, I will remark, is the county seat of the county in which Nauvoo is situated—

"I was awakened at an early hour by a frightful report, which was asserted with confidence and apparent consternation, that the Mormons had already commenced the work of burning, destruction, and murder; and that every man capable of bearing arms was instantly wanted at Carthage, for the protection of the country. We lost no time in starting; but when we arrived at Carthage, we could hear no more concerning this story. Again: During the few days that the militia were encamped at Carthage, frequent applications were made to me to send a force here, and a force there, and a force all about the country, to prevent murders, robberies, and larcenies, which, it was said, were threatened by the Mormons. No such forces were sent; nor were any such offenses committed at that time, except the stealing of some provisions, and there was never the least proof that this was done by a Mormon. Again: On my late visit to Hancock county, I was informed by some of their violent enemies, that the larcenies of the Mormons had become unusually numerous and insufferable. They indeed admitted that but little had been done in this way in their immediate vicinity. But they insisted that sixteen horses had been stolen by the Mormons in one night near Lima, in the county of Adams. At the close of the expedition, I called at this same town of Lima, and upon inquiry was told that no horses had been stolen in that neighborhood, but that sixteen horses had been stolen in one night in Hancock county. This last informant being told of the Hancock story, again changed the venue to another distant settlement in the northern edge of Adams."

A short time afterwards, and during the pendency of these difficulties, and after Smith was arrested, the Governor states that another series of rumors were set on foot. He says that he was on his return to Carthage, a short time before sundown, and—

"When we had proceeded two miles we met two individuals, one of them a Mormon, who informed us that the Smiths had been assassinated in jail, about five or six o'clock of that day. The intelligence seemed to strike every one with a kind of dumbness. As to myself, it was perfectly astounding; and I anticipated the very worst consequences from it."

He then says that a committee appeared at Quincy, which is in the county of Adams, adjoining:

"The next morning, by daylight, the ringing of the bells in the city of Quincy announced a public meeting. The people assembled in great numbers at an early hour. The Warsaw committee stated to the meeting that a party of Mormons had attempted to rescue the Smiths out of jail; that a party of Missourians, and others, had killed the prisoners to prevent their escape; that the Governor and his party were at Nauvoo at the time when intelligence of the fact was brought there; that they had been attacked by the Nauvoo legion, and had retreated to a house where they were then closely besieged; that the Governor had sent out word that he could maintain his position for two days, and would be certain to be massacred if assistance did not arrive by the end of that time. It is unnecessary to say that this entire story was a fabrication. It was of a piece with the other reports put into circulation by the anti-Mormon party to influence the public mind, and call the people to their assistance."

I read this for the purpose of showing that all the rumors which we hear about lawlessness and about the depredations of the Mormons upon the settlers and others, should and ought to be received with a great many degrees of allowance. In the State of Illinois, upon the Mississippi river, where hundreds of steamboats were passing almost daily, the country densely populated all about them, these rumors were got up and believed to such an extent, that troops were raised for the purpose of combating armies which had never assembled at all. It is true, the Mormons conducted themselves in such a way, and such a state of feeling existed in the State of Illinois, that subsequently it became necessary that they should remove from the State according to an agreement which was made with them by the Governor; but there was no battle fought between the opposing parties. Some few lives were lost under misapprehension; perhaps some few persons may have been assassinated; but there was no battle between the citizens of Illinois and the Mormons, and they left the State.

Now, if it were desirable, as it probably is, to expel the Mormons from Salt Lake valley, I have no doubt it could be accomplished without having a single soldier there. I think we have dealt improperly with the Mormons. We did so in the State of Illinois. Our difficulties arose out of our legislation, in my judgment. When that people first settled in Illinois they were welcomed. The different political parties in the State courted their friendship. Their votes controlled a congressional district, and the Legislature of Illinois passed laws organizing them into a separate community. What was called the Nauvoo charter was passed, and under that they had a separate and distinct organization. All this had a tendency to separate them from the people settled around them. When they left our State and went off to Salt Lake valley, the Government of the United States pursued the same course. You created for them a territorial government, and the doctrine prevailed to a large extent over the country, that sovereignty existed in the territorial governments, and that Congress had no authority over the Territories. The doctrine was proclaimed throughout the country that by the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, after the Utah government had been established, some great principle of territorial sovereignty had been recognized, and henceforth and forever the people of each Territory were to be left perfectly free to regulate their own affairs as they pleased. The Mormons embraced this doctrine. Brigham Young was made Governor; they had everything their own way; and I remember to have seen that they passed resolutions indorsing the Cincinnati platform as the true doctrine, and finding fault with the Republican platform, which denounced slavery and polygamy as relics of barbarism. They favored those institutions.

Now, sir, having created a territorial government over them, having authorized the Mormons as a distinct and separate people, to set up a government for themselves, without having repealed the law—without having made any effort to expel them from the jurisdiction of the United States, if it were necessary that they should be expelled—without having any reliable information in regard to their condition, the President sends an army to accompany a newly-appointed Governor to that Territory, and, as I insist, without the least authority. Authority is given in the law for the President of the United States to use the Army in cases of rebellion and insurrection; and if the Mormons are said to be in rebellion, the President can use the Army against them provided he uses it according to the mode prescribed by the act of Congress, and not otherwise. What is that power?

"In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State, or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."

We all know that neither the Governor of Utah Territory, nor the Territorial Legislature, has called upon the President to put down insurrection. In the first place, it is extremely doubtful whether this act of Congress to which I have just referred, has any relation to a Territory, or authorizes the President to use the troops in a Territory at all, to put down an insurrection. Admit that it does, and admit that the act of 1807, amendatory to this act of 1795, from which I have read, authorizes the President to use the Army in all cases where he was before authorized to use the militia by the act of 1795; still he could only use the Army in a Territory in case the Legislature called upon him, or if the Legislature could not be convened, in case the Governor called upon him. That has not been done; so that you cannot derive any authority from these laws for the President to send the Army to Utah.

It is a part of the Constitution of the United States that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. That clause was inserted in the Constitution of the United States for some purpose, and that purpose is thwarted entirely if we are to sanction the action of the Executive in cases like this now under consideration. He makes use of the Army; he incurs a debt without authority of law; for this is a deficiency bill, and it is admitted that there is no appropriation to meet it. We are not permitted to inquire into it. We are not shown the details of this deficiency; but it is enough that the President of the United States has thought proper to make contracts on behalf of the Government of the United States, and has promised to pay money, and Congress must come in and foot the bill. The Constitution intended that Congress should hold control over the Treasury and over the money of the people. Does not this course practically subvert the intention of the Constitution in this respect?

Sir, if an appropriation is to be made to meet these expenditures, I should like to know how a case could arise where Congress would refuse to appropriate money to pay a debt incurred by the Executive? Here is a clear case; and if the money is to be voted in this instance, I do not know how a case could ever arise where Congress would be justified in refusing to vote money. I know that the present Executive is sustained by a great and powerful party who have confidence in him, and are willing to vote almost anything he asks; but that great and powerful party should remember that the present Executive will not always remain in power. Power may pass from their hands. Some other person may be elected President hereafter in whom they will have less confidence than they have in the present Executive; and if they sanction this assumption of power on the part of the present Chief Magistrate and foot the bills, how can they refuse to do it in cases hereafter, when debts shall be incurred by a President who is not the President of their choice?

We must stop somewhere; and I would appeal to those gentlemen who now come up and support this enormous appropriation—I would appeal to them, if not by virtue of their constitutional obligations, by virtue of another obligation, which I believe they all recognize to be binding; for, although the Declaration of Independence is now regarded by some persons as containing a set of tingling generalities, obsolete and having no meaning, and although the Constitution is little heeded, yet I believe that the persons sustaining the appropriations of this character do indorse the Cincinnati platform. That was made less than two years ago; and I believe that is not obsolete. I know in former times, when I acted with, and was a member of, the Democratic party, we considered that a platform was good until another one was constructed; at any rate, that it would last four years, and when the national convention met and nominated a candidate for President, we would stand by its platform until another convention met and made another. But since a new test has been introduced into the Democratic party, and Democracy consists in advocating a particular line of policy in regard to slavery, it is possible that a new doctrine prevails on that subject also. I should hope, however, that the Cincinnati platform is still in force in regard to the expenditure of the public money; and if it is, I wish to call the attention of those who acknowledge its binding obligation (if I cannot get their attention by appealing to the Constitution and the law) to that higher authority—the Cincinnati platform. That declares—under the head of the fifth resolution of the second subdivision it will be found—"that it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs." Now, that is binding. No supporter of the Administration, I presume, will shrink from the obligation of that requirement; and I ask him, as he holds up this fundamental principle, to lay his hand on his heart if he can, and vote for a deficiency of $10,000,000 in a single bill. Is that what is meant by saying "every branch of the Government should enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs?"

There is another resolution adopted at Cincinnati to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia. He says the President of the United States had authority to assemble this army in the Rocky Mountains, and to send it as a posse comitatus with the Governor sent out to Utah. I wish to know where the authority is, where the law or constitutional authority is, and I call his attention to another article in this creed laid down at Cincinnati, which is higher than and above constitutions. The first resolution under the general head declares:

"That the Federal Government is one of limited powers derived solely from the Constitution, and the grants of power therein ought to be strictly construed by all the Departments and agents of the Government, and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers."

The party is in favor of strict construction. Here are contracts made without authority of law; this is not denied, cannot be successfully controverted. Will you sanction them? Here is a use of the Army which none of you can justify to be right. Now, which will you do—will you disown your allegiance to the fundamental principles laid down at Cincinnati two years ago, or will you stand by them and refuse to sanction these enormous appropriations? Are you for practicing that economy which you profess? Are you for holding officers to that rigid accountability which you say they should be held to? If you are, how can you pass this bill?

Now, sir, I am willing to go this far, and it is as far as I would go: I am willing to relieve our troops. If they have been placed in a position without authority, by the President of the United States, where they need supplies, let us relieve them; the common demands of humanity would require that; but I am opposed to appropriating one dollar for the purpose of carrying on a war against the Mormons, created by the Executive without the authority of Congress. Sir, no new condition of things has arisen in Utah since the last adjournment of Congress. There was no necessity for sending off this army without consulting Congress; and if there was a necessity for sending it immediately, Congress should have been convened. Where are we tending if not to a concentration of all powers, and unlimited power, in the hand of the Executive? Why, sir, if the old Federalists, the supporters of the John Adams of 1800, who were in favor of a strong executive Government, could rise up now, they would stand aghast and astonished at the assumptions of power on the part of what is now called a Democratic Executive. The old Federalists never thought of assuming such powers as are now claimed and exercised by the Executive elected by the so-called Democratic party.

I am for bringing this Government back to its ancient moorings; and I agree with these resolutions laid down at Cincinnati; I am in favor of a rigid accountability of our officers; I am opposed to the exercise of doubtful constitutional powers; I am in favor of the most rigid economy. Let us carry out these principles; let us vote in this instance whatever money may be necessary to preserve the army, to rescue it from the perilous position in which it has been placed by having to pass the inclement season of the year in the midst of the snows of the mountains; but let us stop there, and never, until we have ascertained that it is necessary to use this army, until that department of the Government in which is vested the war-making power, shall declare that war exists, let our troops be led forth to slaughter any citizen in any part of the Republic.

Mr. GREEN. It is getting a little too late—Several Senators. Let us vote.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to undertake to demonstrate that the Senator from Illinois is mistaken, and that there is no contract made in violation of law or in the absence of law; but I prefer postponing it until to-morrow, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Mason, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hale, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have a vote now on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the bill will now be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to reserve the amendment of the Senator from Maine. I want to have a separate vote on that.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to call for the yeas and nays on the first amendment, striking out the reporters of the House.

Mr. STUART. It is very obvious that we cannot dispose of this bill to-night; and I understand there is a desire for an executive session. If that is to be so, we had better go into an executive session now. I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HUNTER. If there is no objection to disposing of it, the Senator from Michigan had better let us do so. If any one objects, very well.

Mr. STUART. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. KING. I ask that each amendment be read. There are not many.

The first amendment, made in Committee of the Whole, was to strike out from line twenty-six to twenty-nine, inclusive, the following clause:

"To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the House for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress the usual additional compensation of $800 each—$4,000."

Mr. GREEN. I want the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. BROWN. Before the yeas and nays are taken on that, I ask to amend the amendment by adding:

Also to enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the Senate for reporting the debates of the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress the usual additional compensation of $500 each, $3,200.

Also to enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the Senate for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress the usual additional compensation of $500 each, $3,200.

Mr. President, a single word; I will not detain the Senate. The first proposition is to pay to the Senate reporters the same compensation which the House at the last session paid their reporters. They have paid them, and the appropriation, as I understand it, is covered up under the third section. They have got the money. The Clerk is to be refunded the money, or whoever paid it, under the third section. The second proposition is to pay them during this session the same compensation which the reporters of the House get. Now, I am perfectly willing to see the whole of it stricken out; but if the House reporters are to be paid for the last session and for this one, then it does seem to me palpable that our reporters, who—I say it, with, I think, the full indorsement of the Senate—are equal to any in the world, ought not to be left at a disadvantage. I think there are no such reporters anywhere. I believe that the regular compensation paid them is inadequate; I have thought so for a long time; but take the naked proposition, and I am not for meeting it in this indirect way. I am for increasing the salary by a regular law; but so far as this single proposition stands, if the House reporters are to be paid according to the House proposition this increased compensation, then I want to see our reporters put upon the same footing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I wish to say that we have stricken out that section in committee. If the Senate refuse to concur in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, which will retain this clause, then the Senator's amendment will be in order, and I will vote for it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator will allow me. We have stricken it out in committee. Now if you take a vote and strike it out in the Senate, I shall be too late with my amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. All will be out then.

Mr. BROWN. If Senators will listen to me, I will tell them what I mean by this proposition. I apprehend this matter is to go to a committee of conference. If you take this vote now in the Senate and strike out this amendment—if the Senate, in other words, agrees with the Committee of the Whole—then it is out clearly, and then I will have no chance to amend it.

A SENATOR. We do not want to do it, then.

Mr. BROWN. Listen to me till I tell you. When it goes to a committee of conference, the House will insist upon putting this clause back. I want to file a caveat with the Senate committee, that if the House reporters will come in, the Senate reporters are to come too. If they go out, let all go together. I want it put in for that reason; and when you have got this in, I am quite content to see it all go out together. But I am not willing to allow the House committee, when it goes to a conference, to have this clause reinserted, and leave our reporters out. That is my object in putting it in here.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand this business, and everybody else does perfectly well. I ask for the yeas and nays on it. If you put in this, and add so much weight with the Senate, the result will be that both of them will go through; because, if you multiply and enlarge an abuse, if you enlarge any amount of public plunder, you always increase its chances. If you want to kill them, keep them separate, and then you have some chance; but every single addition to them strengthens them. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KENNEDY. If that is the effect, of course I shall go with the honorable Senator; but I really want to pay our reporters the same as the other House.

Mr. TOOMBS. Before that is taken, I rise to a question of order upon the motion of the Senator from Mississippi. He cannot amend a section that is stricken out. We are in the Senate. It is already stricken out. It is not part of the bill. He has to get it into the bill before he can amend it.

Mr. BROWN. It is only stricken out in committee. We are now in the Senate, and I have a right to perfect the section before you take the vote in the Senate on striking it out finally.

Mr. TOOMBS. The point of order which I make is, that the section is not there. When he gets it back he can amend it. If the Senate refuse to concur with the committee, and it gets in, he can amend it; but the idea of amending a portion of the bill that is not in it at all is clearly against order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Georgia. The Senate struck out that section in committee; and it will remain out of the bill unless by a vote the Senate disagree with the committee.

Mr. BROWN. It is not out of the bill at all until the Senate agrees to put it out. The committee cannot put it out. They simply recommend the Senate to put it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is certainly out of the bill as reported to the Senate by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Chair decide that it is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is under the impression that it is not in order.

Mr. HUNTER. I agree with the Chair entirely.

Mr. BROWN. I will appeal momentarily. A committee of the Senate brings in a bill with amendments praying to strike out certain propositions. Are they stricken out? Certainly not. It is a recommendation to the Senate to strike them out; but, until the Senate has acted, the sections proposed to be stricken out are not out; and what is your Committee of the Whole but a committee of the Senate? It makes recommendations. Its recommendations may be adopted or may not. If the Senate strikes out the section, then how can I amend it? How can I amend that which is out of the bill entirely? Have I not a right to move to perfect a section before you move to strike it out? I do not think there is the least doubt about it in the world. I withdraw the appeal. I simply made it for the purpose of stating the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair then decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on striking out.

Mr. BROWN. If we do not strike out the section, can I move the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. Then I am content.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to say—I am not going to make a speech—I shall vote against this extra; but I concur in what is said by the Senator from Mississippi. I think we have got the best reporters in the world, and they get the poorest pay. Their pay is too low; but still I am against all these extras, and I shall vote against it here.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment to strike out the clause, resulted—yeas 33, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Clay, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Dixon, Green, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, and Wilson—13.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made in the Committee of the Whole was to add to the third section:

And provided further, That it shall never hereafter be lawful for either House of Congress to apply any part of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of such House to any other than the ordinary expenditures of such House, nor to apply any part of said appropriation as extra pay or extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senate will recollect the motive that influenced me the other day to move that amendment, and disinclined me to strike out the whole section. After that amendment was made, and another amendment was proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] the joint resolution of 1854 was brought to my attention for the first time, and I then expressed a desire to do what I thought was right in reference to the legislation that has been heretofore had on this subject. On examination I find that a joint resolution was passed in 1854, in regard to the employes of the legislative department, increasing their pay twenty per cent. upon the express condition that they should have no extra compensation. I acted upon the principle that it had been the uniform usage of the Government, up to the present case, to make these allowances, and they had been passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, until they were stopped in this particular case. I find, however, upon examination, that in regard to some of the officers to whom allowances are made by the third section of this bill, the act of 1854 applies, and in my opinion, they ought not to be included. I will state to the Senate the reason for it, by a simple reference to the act itself, and to the legislation that was had in 1854. This joint resolution was passed on the 20th of July, 1854, and the last proviso in it is:

"That the usual extra compensation shall not hereafter be allowed to any person receiving the benefit of this joint resolution."

The benefit of this joint resolution was an addition of twenty per cent. "upon the compensation now received by them respectively." There has not been, therefore, that uniform usage alluded to before, because I find on reference to an appropriation bill approved March 3, 1857, an express reenactment of this joint resolution. It had been the uniform usage of the Government to allow them up to 1854; but in 1854, in consequence of the joint resolution, they were stopped. An allowance was made by the House of Representatives, and by the Senate, to their employes for 1856. It was not allowed by the accounting officers, and it became necessary that a provision should be inserted in the appropriation bill, providing for these extra compensations; and in that very act it was provided:

"That the extra compensation given by each of the two Houses of Congress, in the year 1856, to its officers and employes shall be paid by its disbursing officer out of the contingent fund, and its accounts therefor shall be allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to repeal the joint resolution of July 20, 1854, 'to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits hereof,' which said resolution is hereby declared to be in full force and effect, except so far as herein provided for."

This was approved March 3, 1857. I understand that, by the third section of the bill, there is a portion of these allowances that go to officers who had their compensation increased in 1854 by an addition of twenty per cent., upon the express condition that they should not have the extra compensation. I therefore move to amend this section, so as to exclude those officers from this section. I move to insert after the word "Congress," in the sixth line, the words:

These allowances to be made not in contravention of the joint resolution "to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits thereof," approved July 20, 1854.

The effect of this amendment will be to cut off all those officers who received additional compensation under the act of 1854, upon condition that they were not afterwards to receive extra compensation.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment, but I wish to suggest, for the sake of dispatch, whether we can amend this amendment. Is not the question on the report of the committee one of concurrence? and the question of concurrence is not amendable. You can only say yea or nay upon it.

Mr. BIGGS. We certainly have a right to amend the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BIGGS. This is an independent amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. STUART. It seems to me there is this very great difficulty about that. If we have any evidence on this subject at all that is reliable, it is that the Clerk of the House has paid out over eighteen thousand dollars of this money, and he has paid some of it to these very men, and it is irrecoverable. Now if we do anything about it at all, we ought to reject it entirely or indorse it as it is. I hope the amendment as it is proposed, which will still leave the officer of the House liable, will not prevail.

Mr. GREEN. Let me correct the Senator. I am informed that a member of the House of Representatives on the Committee of Accounts proposes, if anybody will give him $2,000, to pay everything the Clerk has ever paid in this matter, and he has also said, that not as much as $1,100 has ever been paid, and that this form of saying "refunding" is only put in to get authority to pay. That is my information.

Mr. PUGH. I do not see that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina can be received at this stage. The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole is a proviso at the end of the section. The Senator's present amendment is in the body of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote ought certainly to be taken first upon the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and afterwards on any amendment that may be offered to the bill.

Mr. PUGH. I was about to say that I shall vote for the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and shall also vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, to perfect the clause as far as possible; but I shall afterwards move to strike out the entire section. I am satisfied we shall never stop this abuse until we lay the ax to the root of the tree. It now appears that, by solemn joint resolution, by provisions in the appropriation bill, in every manner in which Congress could speak, they have determined that a stop should be put to these extra allowances, and yet a resolution is offered in one House and the other at the end of the session, and is passed, and we go to the next year, and some gentleman rises, like the Senator from Michigan, to tell us that one of our executive officers has paid the money, and therefore we must indorse it. If the Clerk of the House of Representatives has paid this money in obedience to an order of the House, and in violation of an act of Congress, let us have a bill for his relief; let it go to the Committee on Claims; let his accounts be investigated; and whatever he has paid in good faith, I am willing to refund. But, sir, I am satisfied that Congress may offer twenty per cent., fifty per cent., one hundred per cent., and we shall never stop these extra allowances until we strike out the whole thing, and let the Clerk and every other accounting officer know that Congress will not indorse it in any shape and in any form. Therefore, while I say I shall vote for these amendments lest my motion shall not carry, I shall feel it my duty, at the end, to move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that the Senate adjourn. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have settled all the difficult matters of the bill. I should like to look into this a little further. I am not certain about it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 21, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. B. EDWARDS, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report, accompanied by a bill, from the select committee on printing, for the purpose of reference.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose there will be no objection to it, if the minority report is also allowed to be presented.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I also desire to ask that the views of the minority, to be presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] be also received and printed.

No objection being made,

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the select committee on printing, reported a bill to provide for the public printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, and electrotyping; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move that the views of the minority of the committee, to be presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] be also ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. BOYCE. I rise to a privileged question. I move to take up the report of the committee in the Nebraska contested-election case. I ask the Clerk to read that report.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Is this a special order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Then how does the gentleman call it up?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Is it a privileged question during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It is, at any time.

The Clerk then read the report of the committee, which is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Bird B. Chapman, contesting the right of the Hon. Fenner Ferguson to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, as a Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska, submit as a special report:

That the election out of which this contest arises was held in August last, and the result of the said election was not officially announced until the 3d day of September following; that the contestant gave notice to the sitting member, on the 16th day of September, of his intention to contest his right to a seat, and the response of the sitting member to said notice, dated October 2, 1857, was served on the 10th day of that month on the contestant.

No notice of intention to take testimony was given by the contestant until the 13th and 14th days of November, when more than one half of the time allowed by law to take the same had expired, nor until after the sitting member had left the Territory for this city to enter upon the discharge of his duties. The sitting member has made oath that he knew nothing of the testimony taken in this case until he saw it printed in Miscellaneous Document No. 5, of this House, and that he has had no opportunity to rebut and disprove the same.

Your committee are of opinion that the sitting member erred in not leaving an acknowledged attorney in the Territory to look after the contest, of which he had been notified; and were the contestant and the sitting member alone those who have an interest in its decision, your committee might hesitate before coming to the conclusion to which they have arrived. The question to solve is, not simply what these parties have done or omitted to do, but what was the expressed wish of the people of Nebraska, as between these candidates, at their late election? And what is a reasonable time and indulgence, under the circumstances, to obtain proof of that wish?

As the contestant permitted more than one half of the time allowed by law to elapse before commencing his proof, he can have but little cause for complaint should the period for taking proofs be extended. And as the election has been so recently held, and the contestee averring that he never had any notice of taking testimony, your committee are of opinion that justice to the contestee as well as to the people of Nebraska requires that time be given to take further evidence. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the parties, the contestant and contestee, in this case, be allowed the further time of sixty days from the passage of this resolution to take and return supplemental testimony.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask that the answer of the contestant may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is entitled to the floor. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BOYCE. I do, for that purpose.

The answer of the contestant, Bird B. Chapman, was then read, and is as follows:

To the honorable Committee of Elections of the House of Representatives:

To the statement and affidavit made by Hon. Fenner Ferguson, and to be found on pages 1 and 2 of House Miscellaneous Document No. 19, the undersigned feels it his right and duty to make the following answer, and to protest against any further time being allowed to take testimony in the case:

Page 1 of House Miscellaneous Document No. 5 shows that, on the 16th day of September, 1857, eleven days after the result of the election was determined, notice in writing was personally given to said Fenner Ferguson of the intention of the undersigned to contest his seat; that page 3 of said document No. 5 shows that, under date of October 2, said Ferguson answered to said contestant's notice, and which answer was served on this contestant by leaving the same twelve days afterwards at his usual place of abode, and while he was absent from the Territory. By referring to said answer of sitting Delegate, it will be found strangely or designedly to be a notice with date, but naming no locality as to where written or where the writer might be found or addressed, or any agent or attorney representing him; and so far as this contestant was informed he might have supposed him in his house or in some place about the Territory, or having hastily fled from the Territory to avoid any further notice being served upon him. Therefore, in giving him further notices to take testimony, this contestant had no other course to pursue than that pointed out by the law prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections, to wit: to cause copies of said notices to be left at his usual place of abode, which was done, as appears by the affidavits of James W. Daskam and Loren P. Waldo, jr., to be found on pages 8 and 9 of said document No. 5, and which more fully appears by the depositions of Loren P. Waldo, jr., and George L. Sites, now in possession of your committee.

To the fifth allegation of said Ferguson, found on pages 1 and 2 of House Miscellaneous Document No. 19, that his friends appeared and volunteered to cross-examine witnesses produced by Mr. Chapman and were refused, &c., I have to say that I did object to said cross-examination, because the person asking said privilege declared at the time he was not the agent or attorney of said Ferguson, (see depositions of Nicholas and Daskam, pages 26 and 29, Document No. 5,) and because I knew him to be one of the persons who had perpetrated one of the frauds I had charged in the election; and, further, because at the same time he asked the privilege of cross-examination he accompanied it with a threat that, unless he was thus permitted, certain Mormon witnesses I had subpoenaed would not testify, and which threat was carried out, (see pages 26 and 29 of said Document, No. 5;) and, further, because that I had been informed by one Silas A. Strickland that he was the attorney of said Ferguson, and should so act in this case; and it will appear by House Miscellaneous Document No. 17, pages 3 and 4, that on the 3d December, 1857, seven days after the close of taking of testimony in my behalf, said Silas A. Strickland, as attorney of said Fenner Ferguson, and in my absence from the Territory, caused notice to be left at my usual place of abode, in Omaha City, as attorney of said Ferguson, to proceed, on the 14th of the same month, to take the testimony of eighteen persons in the defense of said Ferguson's right to his seat, and on the day named did proceed to take testimony, as will appear by said Document No. 17.

Contestant, therefore, in view of the above facts, and of the trouble and expense he has been to, and that, too, in strict accordance with the law, claims the privilege of an early hearing, and that without the delay of sixty days, and more especially as he is not aware of any formal application for delay, accompanied with any reasons therefor, having been made by either party in the case. He further asks that this statement, with the depositions of Loren P. Waldo, jr., and George L. Sites, now in the hands of the committee, be printed.

Respectfully submitted,
February, 1858.

B. B. CHAPMAN.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the question for the House to determine at this time, is as to the extension of time to take testimony.

The facts bearing upon this point, as I conceive them, are few and uncontroverted. They are substantially as follows: The election out of which this contestation arises took place in August, 1857; the result of the election was officially announced September 3, 1857; the contestant, Hon. Bird B. Chapman, gave notice of contest on the 16th of September, and the response of the sitting Delegate to said notice was served on the contestant October 2, 1857; notice of intention to take testimony was given by the contestant on the 13th and 14th of November, 1857, by leaving a notice at the alleged "usual abode" of the sitting Delegate, after the said sitting Delegate had left the Territory for Washington, to enter on the discharge of his duties. The sitting Delegate states, under oath, that he had no knowledge of the notice alleged to have been given as above mentioned, nor any knowledge of the testimony taken by the contestant, until after the meeting of Congress. There is no allegation of actual notice to the contestant of the intention of the contestee to take testimony. The question, then, is as to the effect to be given to the notice left at the supposed "usual abode." To a just understanding of this point, attention is called to the notice left at the supposed "usual abode," and the affidavit of the sitting Delegate.

The notice is as follows:

I hereby certify that I have, this 13th day of November, 1857, at the hour of eleven o'clock, a. m., delivered to Andrew Sagendorf, at the usual place of abode of Hon. Fenner Ferguson, in Bellevue, Nebraska Territory, a copy of the foregoing notice, directed to "Hon. Fenner Ferguson, his agent, or his attorney, Bellevue, Nebraska Territory," and indorsed on the outside of the envelope in these words, namely: "The enclosed is a notice to Hon. Fenner Ferguson of the intention of Bird B. Chapman to take testimony in the case of contest of Bird B. Chapman vs. Fenner Ferguson."

Sworn to before

JAMES W. DASKAM.
ELEAZER WAKELEY,
Associate Justice of Supreme Court.

The affidavit of the sitting Delegate is as follows:

District of Columbia, City of Washington, ss:

Fenner Ferguson being duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska in the House of Representatives of the United States, and that his seat is contested by Hon. Bird B. Chapman; that by House Miscellaneous Document No. 5, he learns that said Chapman has taken certain depositions and affidavits in said matter of contest; that this deponent never had any knowledge or notice of the taking of any depositions until after the first day of December last, when he learned by letter that Mr. Chapman had been taking depositions in Nebraska for the purpose of being used in said contest.

This deponent further says, that he left Nebraska on the 18th day of September last, and has not returned since; that previous to leaving, he rented his dwelling-house to Silas A. Strickland, for the term of one year, from the 20th day of September last; that he is informed by Mr. Strickland, and believes that said Strickland entered into the possession of said dwelling house in September last, and continues to occupy and possess the same.

And this deponent further says, that he does not know by what right Andrew Sagendorf was at said dwelling-house on the 13th day of November last, or at any other time; that when this deponent left Nebraska said Sagendorf was residing on his farm or claim, some nine or ten miles from deponent's dwelling-house; that this deponent never, in any matter, authorized said Sagendorf to act for him as agent, attorney, or in any other capacity; that he has no privacy or agreement with him whatever; that said Sagendorf never informed this deponent that a notice for taking depositions or testimony in said contest had been delivered to him; and that the first knowledge or intimation which this deponent had that any such notice had been delivered to said Sagendorf was obtained from an examination of said printed document, No. 5; and deponent further says that he has always understood, and he believes, that said Andrew Sagendorf was a supporter of Hon. Bird B. Chapman for Congress at the late election; and that he, said Sagendorf, is politically hostile to this deponent. FENNER FERGUSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of January, A. D. 1858. C. W. C. DUNNINGTON, Justice of the Peace.

Now the question is, what is best to be done to further the justice of the case, under this state of facts? To permit no further testimony to be taken, and determine the case on the evidence taken ex parte, on the aforesaid notice, would be to oust the sitting Delegate without hearing any evidence whatever from him. On the other hand, to exclude entirely the testimony taken, and thus decide the case, would be to cut off the contestant summarily, and place the sitting Delegate permanently in his seat. By either mode great injustice might be done. The committee concluded, therefore, that the nearest approximation to justice was, to receive the evidence already taken, and extend the time for the further taking of testimony. Then all the evidence will come out, and the committee and the House be in a condition to say who, of the parties claiming the seat, is rightfully entitled to it. My own impression, concurring with that of the committee, is, that this course, the extension of the time of taking of testimony, is the best thing we can do, under all the circumstances of the case. The House have the power, in the exercise of their discretion, a just discretion, to extend the time of taking testimony. I think this case is one which recommends itself to the exercise of this power of extension, and I hope, therefore, the resolution recommended by the committee will be adopted by the House, and the parties interested have the opportunity of fully developing their evidence.

The question being upon the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the parties contestant and contested in this case be allowed the further time of sixty days from the passage of this resolution to take and return supplementary testimony.

Mr. PHILLIPS offered the following amendment:

Strike out the words "the further time of sixty days from the passage of this resolution," and insert in lieu thereof, the words "until the first day of October next."

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. GROW. I desire to appeal to my colleague to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to have printed a bill which the select committee on printing purpose at some future time to report. It is a bill to provide for the election, by the House, of a Superintendent of Folding, and we desire to have it printed in order that members may have an opportunity to examine it before the matter is brought up for consideration.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I wish to say that I am not now prepared to present the minority report on this matter. I did not agree to the bill; and when the matter comes up, I shall state my objections to it.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The report of the Committee of Elections was made on the 2d of February, when they recommended that sixty days from that time be allowed to take testimony. If sixty days' time were now allowed, it would not expire until after the close of the session, and this would deprive that Territory of a representative on this floor in the mean time. I have, consequently, thought it best to offer an amendment extending the time on both sides until the 1st day of October next. The testimony, in either case, cannot be returned until the next session of Congress; and my amendment, if adopted, will give ample time to both parties. It will allow the sitting member to represent the Territory until the end of the session, and, at the same time, allow the matter to be brought up for consideration at as early a day as it would be under the resolution reported by the committee. I call the previous question.

Mr. TRIPPE. I trust the previous question will not be ordered upon this matter.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I withdraw the call to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. TRIPPE. I am not a member of the Committee of Elections, but I intend to give my vote upon his question upon the principles which governed my vote in a case of a similar kind upon a previous occasion in this House.

I will admit, that within the last few minutes I have come in possession of the facts of this case. Half an hour ago I did not know such a report was made by the committee. My judgment, therefore, may be premature; but so far as I can see, from the papers in the case, I say, with all due respect to the committee, I do not find any good reason assigned to justify their action. Not one. And the committee themselves take a position in their report directly in the teeth of their recommendation, and which overrides it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to suggest to the gentleman, that it appeared in evidence before the committee, and I believe it is so stated in the report, that citizens were refused the privilege of cross-examining the witnesses of the contestant.

Mr. TRIPPE. It matters not, one way or the other. It cannot affect the merits of this case. The House will recollect that, some few weeks since, they refused an extension of time to the gentleman from the State of Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL], whose seat is contested. I voted against that extension. I believed then that I voted right. I believe now that I voted right, and that this House did right in refusing the extension of time in that case; and if we are to preserve consistency, not only in regard to that vote, but in regard to justice itself, this continuance cannot be granted.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] states that citizens were refused the privilege of cross-examining the witnesses for the contestant. Grant it. The committee took the proper position in their report when they say that the sitting member, before he left the Territory, ought to have appointed an accredited agent to represent him. Surely, this House does not mean to take the position that, when a gentleman is elected either as a member or Delegate of this House, he can immediately rent his house and become a resident nowhere, have no notorious place of abode, travel the world over, if you please, so that he cannot be found, and a notice of contest cannot be served on him personally, and thereby a contestant is to lose his legal rights. Why, sir, my friend from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] is elected fifteen or sixteen months before he is called upon to discharge his duties here. He might rent his house, travel all over Europe in that time, and if I were a contestant in his district, I could not find him to serve notice on him; and then he might come in here at the next Congress and say, forsooth, that he was not served personally with notice, nor with notice left at his residence, and ask the House to extend the time, not only for sixty days, but to extend it to a period that would run into the next session of Congress, as is proposed in this case; and in the mean time, both would draw their pay, mileage, and per diem, as we know that is the practice. From what does the difficulty result in this case? From the sitting member's own negligence. He ought to have left an accredited agent in the Territory, to represent him in the taking of testimony, as the committee say. If citizens were refused the privilege of cross-examining witnesses, who is to blame?

The committee take the position in their report that it is not only the rights of the sitting Delegate and the contestant that are involved, but the rights of the people of the Territory. And right here I will remark that I do not know who is entitled to the seat, and I do not care who gets it. Grant that the rights of the people of the Territory are involved. That is so in all contested-election cases. Why, did not you vote to extend the time for the gentleman from Ohio on that principle? There are more people in the third district of Ohio than in the whole of Nebraska Territory. Messrs. Campbell and Vallandigham received more votes than the whole vote of Nebraska Territory; and the question could have been raised in that case that not only were the rights of Messrs. Campbell and Vallandigham involved in the issue, but the rights of over twenty thousand voters of the third district of Ohio. Why did not that consideration control the House then, and induce them to grant the extension of time asked for? Sir, I hope the House will act consistently in relation to all these cases. I intend, upon every contested-election case, whether in determining upon preliminary questions or on the merits of the cases, to decide them as a juror; and not upon one day to give a verdict upon one side, and upon another day, upon precisely the same showing, to give a verdict upon the other side.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this report was made on the 2d of February, but the motion for a continuance has not been brought up for a hearing until after the middle of April, and it is now proposed that the postponement shall extend beyond the present session of Congress. The result will be that we shall have both these gentlemen here during the present session; and coming back next session, and both drawing full pay and mileage. Now, sir, there is not a single feature in the case that would justify a continuance. The sitting Delegate avers, in his affidavit, that he did not, until after the 1st of December, have knowledge that testimony was being taken by the contestant. In the first place, I answer, in the words of the committee, that he ought to have had knowledge of it before, for he ought to have left an accredited agent in the Territory. The committee tell us so, and I thank them for the word. If he intended to come on here before the time when the notice to take testimony was served, he ought to have left an agent behind him; for, mark you, notice that his seat would be contested had already been served. It is his own fault that he was not represented and did not receive the notice. I trust, sir, the House will show some consistency with the vote it gave a few weeks ago, and that what is sauce for the goose will be made sauce for the gander.

Mr. BOYCE. I call the previous question.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I would like the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw the previous question for a moment, that I may suggest a further amendment to the resolution, which is, that the testimony shall not be taken during the session of Congress, but may be taken during the vacation. If that amendment be not made, possibly injustice may be done to the sitting Delegate by the contestant taking testimony while he is compelled to be here attending to his duties.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I accept the modification.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Insert the words: "Such testimony not to be taken during the present session of Congress."

The resolution was so modified.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his call for the previous question?

Mr. BOYCE. I withdraw it.

Mr. COX. I will simply say here that I wish to make my vote consistent with the vote I gave on a former occasion against the extension of time. If the time is to be extended at the pleasure of parties here, this matter of contesting seats of members will become a mere farce, and a very expensive farce, not only to members, but to the Government. It is well understood that both the sitting Delegate and the contestant will draw their pay meanwhile, that both will draw their mileage, and that both will be at expense meanwhile. Now, so far as the papers before the House throw any light upon this matter, it appears to me that the House is as ready to act in this case now as it will be in October or sixty days hence. So far as it appears from these papers, (and I have only cursorily glanced over them,) this notice of contest was served on the 16th day of September, eleven days after the result of the election in Nebraska was announced. Shortly after that time the present sitting Delegate, on the 2d of October, made his response to that notice. Then followed the notice on the part of Mr. Chapman to the sitting Delegate to take depositions. That notice was served exactly in conformity to law. In every respect the gentleman who contests this seat has pursued the law in such case made and provided. He served the notice, according to the statement which I hold in my hand, at the usual place of abode of the sitting member, in the Territory of Nebraska. I cannot see how he could have done otherwise, and I say this with all deference to the committee. I do not see how he could have pursued the law in any other mode. Could he have followed the sitting Delegate to Washington city?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer his question. I understood from the parties that, after the election, they did meet in this city, and it seems to me that notice might have been given at that time, or the contestant might have ascertained the place at which a notice could have been answered.

Mr. COX. In response to that, I will read the statement of the contestant. He says:

"By referring to said answer of sitting Delegate, it will be found strangely or designedly to be a notice with date, but naming no locality as to where written or where the writer might be found or addressed, or any agent or attorney representing him; and, so far as this contestant was informed, he might have supposed him in his house, or in some place about the Territory, or having hastily fled from the Territory to avoid any further notice being served upon him. Therefore, in giving him further notices to take testimony, this contestant had no other course to pursue than that pointed out by the law prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections, to wit: to cause copies of said notices to be left at his usual place of abode, which was done, as appears by the affidavits of James W. Daskam and Loren P. Waldo, jr., to be found on pages 8 and 9 of said Document No. 5, and which more fully appears by the depositions of Loren P. Waldo, jr., and George L. Sites, now in possession of your committee."

If that be true—and I suppose that those depositions carry out that statement—then the contestant has pursued the law in every regard; and why, then, should this matter be further postponed? If we wish to have these matters speedily settled; if we wish to have these contested-election cases closed up while the subject-matter is fresh, and there is no chance to raise testimony to suit every occasion; if we wish to settle them while the facts are in the memory of those who can speak to the subject, then I think that we ought not to postpone them. We ought to act upon them promptly, not only in reference to the expense to the people, but the expense to the contestant, the sitting Delegate, and all around.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this matter ought to be disposed of now. We are just as ready to dispose of it at this moment as we will be in October, and just as ready to do justice to both parties.

Mr. STEVENSON. The vote on this report in the Committee of Elections was not a unanimous vote. I believe that the proposition to extend further time was carried only by a majority of one in that committee. I do not remember whether the committee was full or not, but I am satisfied that the record of that committee will show—

Mr. PHILLIPS. Let me interrupt the gentleman. I have the minutes of that committee before me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has great doubt whether it is in order to refer upon the floor to what has transpired in committee. There have been rulings that it is not in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The vote stood seven to two.

Mr. STEVENSON. I may be in error, and I stand corrected. I only rise to explain my own record, and my own vote in that committee. I entirely concur with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE,] that the notice in this case was sufficiently full and legal in all its aspects. I regard that the contestant did all he could do, by leaving a copy of that notice at the residence of the sitting Delegate. He did more than that: for, after notifying the sitting Delegate that it was his intention to contest the seat, he then served a notice on a gentleman who had been his reputed active agent in the Territory. He then proceeded, after having given both of these notices, to take testimony himself, believing that he had done all that he was required to do. Believing that it would be a frittering away of every attempt to contest an election, as has been well described by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE,] I voted for deciding the case upon its merits, on the testimony before the committee.

One word more, and I am done. I do not think that this case resembles in all respects the case alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia, upon which a vote was taken in this House some weeks ago. In the Ohio case, more than a year had elapsed, and a long space had been allowed to the gentlemen in that case to take testimony. My vote, then, was mainly based upon the fact that, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] had gone on and taken proof after the sixty days had expired, and had brought that proof here, and a technical objection were interposed, then I should have voted to give him an extension of time; but that was not done. In the present case, this testimony was taken in the month of November, a short time before the meeting of Congress; and in that respect the cases are dissimilar.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The committee recommend, and I concur in the report, that further time should be given to these parties. I do so because I am not satisfied, upon the evidence as it stands, which of the parties is elected, which has the most good votes and is entitled to a seat here. Judge Ferguson appeared before the committee and made an affidavit to the fact that, having been in the Territory a long time, and being desirous of making a visit, before the commencement of Congress, to the State of New York, where he formerly lived, he left the Territory on a journey east, renting his residence. After he left Nebraska he came to Washington. He had received notice of the contest before he left. While at Washington he met the contestant, and he told the contestant that he had left Nebraska and was not going to return for some time. Nevertheless, Mr. Chapman, the contestant, returned to Nebraska and gave his notice. Instead of leaving it in the hands of the gentleman who had rented, and then occupied the house of the sitting member, he left it in the hands of another person who happened to be boarding in the house, but who, at the time the sitting member moved out of it, resided, as I am informed, at a distance of ten miles therefrom, and who was in no sense his agent or attorney. I did not believe that the committee, under the testimony taken in the absence of Judge Ferguson, could be satisfied with anything but an extension of time for taking further testimony; and therefore it was that, believing that the only way in which we could get at the actual facts in the case, and to know which of these gentlemen was truly and really elected, was to order the testimony to be taken at a time when both parties could be present and know what was testified to, this resolution was ordered to be reported. I hope that the resolution will be adopted; and I call for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question in regard to this thing. One of the notices in this case was served upon a gentleman named Strickland, who occupied the house that had been occupied by the sitting member. I ask the gentleman if it does not appear afterwards in another paper, Miscellaneous Documents No. 19, that on the 2d of December, 1857, the same Mr. Strickland, as the attorney for the sitting member, served a notice on Mr. Chapman, the contestant, and whether he was not regarded as his attorney at the time?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand that Mr. Strickland was not the agent or attorney of Judge Ferguson in this matter; and also, that the principal notice was left with a man named Sagendorf. Another notice was left with Mr. Strickland; and he, acting as the friend of the sitting member, volunteered to serve as his attorney. An objection was made, that he had no right to appear as an attorney, although he was a citizen of the district, and was interested in the representation of the Territory. He was objected to by the friends of Mr. Chapman, and was not permitted to ask the witnesses any question whatever. And now, under those circumstances, we are asked to pass on the case. I call for the previous question.

Mr. CHAPMAN, (the contestant.) Am I entitled to say anything on this question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It has never been the habit of this House to grant to contestants the right to discuss interlocutory questions. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the contestant cannot be heard on this question, except by the consent of the House; and that in every single instance where the privilege has been accorded to a contestant it has been conferred by an express resolution, or authority given by the majority of the House.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I move that the contestant have the right to be heard on this question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I presume that if the House grant the privilege to one of the parties it should be also granted to the other.

The SPEAKER. The sitting member has the right to be heard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is the motion in order, pending the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion cannot be entertained pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. POTTLE. I suppose that if the previous question be voted down the motion will then be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers on the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARTRELL, and WASHBURN of Maine, were appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Does the contestant desire to be heard on this preliminary question?

The SPEAKER. The contestant rose and indicated his desire to be heard. A gentleman sitting near him, [Mr. Cox,] subsequently rose and stated that the contestant waived the application.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If the gentleman wants to be heard, let him have the privilege.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the contestant desires to be heard?

Mr. COX. The contestant informed me, after the call for the previous question, that he would not press his application on the House.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes ninety-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS, as modified.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. I would inquire whether those who desire to have this case disposed of at once, will not have to vote negatively upon both propositions, as there is no question pending for a final disposition of the case?

The SPEAKER. Those who are in favor of deciding the case now will have to vote, "no."

Mr. COLFAX. I move, then, to lay the resolution and pending amendment on the table, so that the contest can be decided without further delay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I desire to inquire for information what will be the effect of adopting the motion to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table? Will it lay the whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It would only lay upon the table the question as to the extension of time?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire if the resolution is laid upon the table, whether the House will not be obliged to determine this question upon the ex parte testimony taken in the absence of the sitting member?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information as to what facts are in possession of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] to say that the committee desire further testimony.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object to debate.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Gartrell, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, George W. Jones, Keiser, Kilgore, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Nichols, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Quinton, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Stevenson, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trappe, Walton, Warren, Watkins, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Abt, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Burnett, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cockrell, Comins, Corning, Covode, Craig, James Craig, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dodd, Edmundson, Elliott, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Huyler, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, Landy, Leidy, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Miles, Miller, Milson, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, James A. Stewart, Tabbot, Thayer, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Ward, Elfish B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, and Augustus T. Wright—106.

So the House refused to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

Pending the call, Mr. BOCKOCK stated that Mr. GARNETT being called home upon very important business, had paired off upon all contested-election cases, and upon the Kansas question, with Mr. HICKMAN; and upon the question of the admission of Minnesota, with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that Mr. HERRON had been called home on important business, and that he (Mr. NICHOLS) had paired him off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, until a week from next Thursday.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS; and it was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution as amended,

Mr. HUGHES demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Billinghurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bockock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cockerill, Collins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dick, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Grainger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Howard, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Knapp, Landy, Leach, Leidy, Lovejoy, McClay, McQueen, Miles, Miller, Millson, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Spinner, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Branch, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Dawes, Dean, Dowdell, Fenton, Gartrell, Goode, Groesbeck, Lawrence, W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hawkins, Hill, George H. Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, John W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Maynard, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Pettit, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zoellcoffer—85.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to. Mr. BOYCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before my motion is put, I offer the usual resolution to close the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Military Academy appropriation bill, in thirty minutes after the committee shall resume its consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. I object. Has the gentleman a right to offer that resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has. Mr. STANTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not commenced. Mr. STANTON. So I supposed. There has been no morning hour, and no morning business.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is voted down, will not the bill of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] be the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first business in order if the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union fails.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I could not hear the point made by the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont desired that the House should proceed to the consideration of the business of the morning hour.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion is in order.

The resolution to close debate was adopted.

The question recurred on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

RESOLUTIONS OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to present joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Virginia, for reference?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER then, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Virginia, for a final settlement of half pay to officers of the revolutionary war; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REFERENCE TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. GIDDINGS,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Doctor Frederick Seigle be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Court of Claims.

RESOLUTIONS OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts in relation to the Dred Scott decision; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNAPP, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts in relation to Kansas; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. LOVEJOY, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I send up a resolution asking for information, to which I suppose there will be no objection.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot yield further. I must insist on my motion.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The question was taken; and Mr. J. GLANCY JONES's motion was agreed to—ayes one hundred, noes not counted.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SEWARD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1859.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment offered yesterday by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to strike out the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines, as follows:

—"ninety-four thousand eight hundred and eighty-six dollars.

"For pay of eight professors at the Military Academy, $16,000."

And to insert in lieu thereof:

—"one hundred and twelve thousand eight hundred and six dollars.

So as to make the clause read:

"For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $112,000."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, as I understand it, is made necessary in consequence of the construction given to the act of the last Congress increasing the pay of the commissioned officers of the Army. This is the language of that act:

"That from and after the commencement of the present fiscal year the pay of every commissioned officer of the Army, including military storekeepers, shall be increased twenty dollars per month, and that the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be thirty cents per ration."

Now, sir, there are eight professors at the Military Academy, whose annual salary is fixed by law at $2,000; and by a construction at the Department upon the act which I have just read, it is held and considered that these professors are commissioned officers in the Army of the United States, and are entitled to this increased compensation of twenty dollars per month. The part of the bill which it is proposed to strike out appropriates $16,000 for the salaries of these eight professors. The additional sum in the amendment is required under the construction given to that act at the Department.

I merely wish to say that I do not approve of this construction of the law; I do not believe myself that the professors of that academy are commissioned officers of the Army. They have no position in the line; they are attached to no corps or regiment. I think that the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is right, and that the construction given to the law of last session is wrong.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state the facts as I understand them. On the 3d of March, 1857, Congress passed a law providing for an increase of twenty dollars a month to the pay of the commissioned officers of the United States Army. The question, shortly after, came up in the Comptroller's office whether the professors at West Point were technically commissioned officers. There was a doubt on the subject. The matter was investigated, and it was then ascertained that they were held to be commissioned officers under the opinions of Mr. Wirt, a former Attorney General, Mr. Berrien, another Attorney General, and the Secretary of War. The money was paid to them under that state of the case during the last fiscal year. The question again came up before the Committee of Ways and Means at this session, and before these facts were known to that committee, and this bill was reported with the item for this extra pay for these professors left out. Immediately afterwards, by letter, I called on the Department for the information which it had on the subject, and I received in reply what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the chief engineer, in answer to your letter of the 15th instant, inquiring whether any of the professors employed at the Military Academy are commissioned officers of the Army; and, if so, that the character of their duties be designated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, December 19, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to this office of the letter of Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated the 15th instant, asking whether any of the professors employed at the Military Academy are commissioned officers of the Army; and if so, that they be designated, with the character of their duties.

Understanding the object of the question to be to ascertain whether any of the professors of the academy hold commissions in the line of the Army in addition to their commissions as professors, I reply in the negative. Such of them as held line commissions when appointed professors having vacated them.

All the professors are, however, commissioned officers of the Army in virtue of their present commissions, having been recognized as such by the decisions of several Secretaries of War, an Attorney General, and a Comptroller of the Treasury, and are entitled, under these decisions, to the allowances granted by law to other commissioned officers of the Army. The letter of Mr. JONES is returned herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,

Captain of Engineers, in charge.

Hon. JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1857.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 22d instant, inquiring in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means whether any payments have been made since the commencement of the fiscal year 1857, to any of the professors at the Military Academy, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of officers of the Army," approved February 21, 1857; and, if so, by what authority such payments were made?

I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the Paymaster General, which contains the information desired by you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE.

December 30, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to return the letter of the Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, of the 22d instant, and to report thereon.

The professors in the Military Academy receive the increase of pay granted by the act of February 21, 1857, to "commissioned officers of the Army," by authority of the "Regulations of the Army," published by the late Administration, and now in force, (see Army pay-table, general regulations, page 293,) and of your decision of the 13th of May, affirming this regulation as according to law.

The old regulations decided in like manner the like question, arising under the act of July 5, 1838, to wit: that the professors receive the ration for five years' service, granted by that act to "commissioned officers of the line or staff." This construction of the act of 1838 was in accordance with the opinion of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, Judge Parris, and is recognized by the appropriation act for the Military Academy, September 16, 1850.

The Comptroller did at first doubt if the words "commissioned officers of the line or staff," in the act of 1838, included the professors. Mr. Attorney General Wirt had given the opinion that they are not commissioned officers in the sense of the sixty-fourth article of war to sit on courts-martial; because such courts have general jurisdiction in the Army, and the law of 1812 provides that the "academic staff, as such, shall not have command in the Army separate from the academy." But this does not deny, and has never been understood by the War Department to deny, that they are commissioned officers, in the sense of other statutes, or other clauses of the same statute; for another Attorney General (Berrian) decides that the officers of the general staff, not having rank, are not competent to sit on courts-martial; and Mr. Wirt had declared the "Military Academy to be part of the land forces of the United States," and subject to the rules and articles of war, and to trial by courts-martial; and these professors are held amenable, under those articles of war, as commissioned officers in all breaches of discipline, or other offenses therein provided.

Finally, if they are commissioned officers in trials for offenses, under the penal statute, if they are commissioned officers of the line or staff, as recognized by law under the act of 1838, for stronger reasons they were held to be "commissioned officers of the Army" in the sense of the late act, which expressly included storekeepers in that description, and extended its benefits to the chaplains employed by the councils of administration of the posts.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN F. LARNED,
Paymaster General.

Hon. J. B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The committee learning these facts—that these professors are held by decisions of Attorneys General as commissioned officers, and that the Army regulations rate them at this increased pay—have instructed me to report the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether these professors at West Point have any connection with the Army other than by their professorship at that school?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will resume the floor. There is no difference between the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and myself as to the facts of the case; but the difference between us is in regard to the proper construction of the act of 21st of February, 1857, which increased the pay of the commissioned officers of the Army. Here is the Biennial Register—the official Register—which gives the names of the professors at West Point, and of what they are professors. There are professors of civil and military engineering, of natural and experimental philosophy, of mathematics, of drawing, of the French language, of ethics and English studies, (also chaplain,) of chemistry, mineralogy and geology, and of the Spanish language—in all eight. Their pay is fixed at $2,000 per annum, each with quarters at the academy, and, I believe, with some longevity rations. They are subject to removal by the President, and he does remove them, I understand, at pleasure, and appoints their successors as he does other civil officers.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The President's power extends to the Army and Navy in the same degree. The President has power to remove any officer of the Army or Navy at pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The President may have that power. I am not disposed to controvert that; but it is not the practice to remove such officers except in extreme cases, and then the President merely drops them—I believe that is the term used—and in the line of promotion fills up the vacancy. But as I said before, these professors get $2,000 salary and quarters, and longevity rations. By the construction of the act of the last Congress it is now proposed to increase their pay twenty dollars per month. I do not think that those who brought forward, advocated, and succeeded in passing, the act to increase the pay of commissioned officers, supposed that they were including the professors at that academy. As to all the other officers and the assistant officers at that academy, they have their place in the line, or in some corps, or in some branch of the staff.

Mr. QUITMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee remarked that those who voted for increasing the pay of the commissioned officers of the Army did not, in all probability, suppose they were including the professors at the West Point Military Academy. I will say to him that I happened to be the person who drafted that bill; and that the professors at that institution were intended by me to be included; and I would not have used the term "commissioned officers of the Army" had not such been the intention. In every point of view they are commissioned officers of the Army; they are a part of the engineer corps of the Army, and are subject to the same laws which govern officers of the Army.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman from Mississippi if the professors have any rank, if they are in the line of promotion, if they are removable by court-martial, and whether they may not be removed by the President whenever he sees fit?

Mr. QUITMAN. They may be removed, and so may officers of the Army. They are subject to court-martial; I think they have assimilated rank in some cases, but they are not in the line of promotion, because there are no grades in their branch of the service. They are commissioned by the same instrument, in the same form, that any other officer of the Army is commissioned. The language of the commission is precisely the same, and the same reason applies for increasing their pay as applies to other officers of the Army. Their standing in every respect is like that of officers of the Army, except in respect to promotion; and I see no reason why they should be separated from them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have examined the biennial Army Register, and I find no assimilated rank, or any other rank, attaching to the professors at that place. I find nothing in the law which gives them any rank or command of which the gentleman from Mississippi has spoken. They are put down merely as professors, but without any rank or grade.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Register is no criterion to judge by, and especially when we have the law before us. The question we are now considering is not the question whether in all particulars the professors at the Military Academy at West Point are commissioned officers. The question is as to the intent of Congress in providing for the additional compensation of twenty dollars per month to the commissioned officers of the Army. Whom did Congress intend to include in that bill? There is but one opinion so far as I have been able to ascertain, and that is, that it includes these officers. I have not heard a dissenting opinion. It has been so decided by two Attorneys General; it has been decided at the War Department, by the Comptroller of the Treasury, where the question was regularly raised and examined. The question raised by my friend from Tennessee as to whether they are, in every particular, commissioned officers of the Army, is not the point at issue. The question is, whether Congress did not intend by that act to embrace them as quasi commissioned officers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are various officers at that academy. Each one of them, except those professors, is a commissioned officer of the Army; he has his rank in some regiment, or in some corps, and many of them who have their position in the Army and in the corps, are assistant professors at the academy. They get the pay and emoluments of their rank; they are subject to the law of February 21, 1857, and are entitled to the increased pay provided by that act. But the professors themselves, created by law, and appointed in pursuance of it, with a fixed salary of $2,000, are not, as I contend, in that class of commissioned officers of the Army, and do not come within the provisions of the act of the last session, increasing the pay of the commissioned officers of the Army.

Mr. CURTIS. I had a few words to say yesterday upon this subject. The Military Academy at West Point is a part of the corps of the Army of the United States. It is a part of the engineer corps, and every man and every officer attached to it is, therefore, incorporated with that corps of the Army. The professors at that place are officers of the corps of engineers. They receive their appointments from the President of the United States. It is for life or during good behavior. Many of them, and most of them, are commissioned officers of the United States Army, who, before they went into the offices of professors, were lieutenants of the engineer corps. The whole academy, and everything connected with it, and all its officers, are subject to the rules of the Army and the articles of war; they are liable to be tried by court-martial and dismissed; they can report a cadet or any other officer, bring specifications against him, and have him tried and dismissed. They have all the rights and duties that officers of the Army have. The only difference is, that they have no prospect of promotion. That is their misfortune. It is a sacrifice which they make for the good of their country.

But they are in the same situation as a major-general of the Army of the United States. He cannot be promoted, and that is his misfortune. Why? Because there is no higher office that he could acquire. And so with the professor at the academy at West Point. He takes the position of professor because he thinks that is as high as any office he can attain. Some of these professors have been serving for twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years, and still retain the rank they held at the commencement of their service. They have not participated in the brilliant service of their country, but they have been satisfied to remain there teaching students the rules and regulations of the Army of the United States, and all the various duties of a soldier. If there be any officers in the service of the United States, who serve their country to advantage, and who really do fulfill duties that are important to the Army of this country, they are the professors at the Military Academy.

It seems to me, therefore, right that they have been recognized by the Department as commissioned officers. They are so, to all intents and purposes, except the want, perhaps, of a spread eagle on a piece of paper or parchment, showing that they hold the rank of colonel, or some other military rank. The Military Academy was established on the principle that it was a part of the Army; its officers are incorporated in the Army, and though they have no promotion, it is merely because no such arrangement could possibly be made in consideration of their professorships. They are entitled to it, if promotion were possible. For one, sir, I think it only right that they should receive this increase of twenty dollars per month—that they should receive the same advantages which their peers in other sections of the Army receive. There can be no doubt of the propriety of their receiving the same compensation, or the same increase of compensation, that other officers receive. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted. It will then justify the Department in the position they have taken in recognizing these men as officers of the engineer corps. This is not a mere technical question. It goes to the merits of their position. I ask that their position shall be recognized as officers of the Army, and that their pay shall be increased when the pay of other officers is increased.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, differing in the construction which has been given to the law by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and also by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] I take this occasion to express my views upon it. I am of the opinion that the emolument proposed to be given to the professors of the Military Academy at West Point, if the amendment shall prevail, will not be too great. It is not upon that ground that I oppose the amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, but it is upon the construction of the law. This Military Academy was established by the organization of a corps of engineers to be stationed at West Point, and with ten cadets under them. That was by the act of 1802. In the subsequent act of 1812 there was provision made for an increased number of cadets; and provision was made by that law that the professors at the Military Academy at West Point should be taken from the officers of the engineer corps of the Army; and that act also provided that those professors should receive the pay and emoluments of certain officers in the Army—it gave them assimilated rank. Subsequent legislation of Congress has provided that the officers and professors of the Military Academy may be taken from persons in civil life; and if my information is correct, none of the professors at the Military Academy at West Point now hold commissions in the Army, and several of them have been appointed from civil life. At the last Congress, you added to the number of professorships at West Point, a professorship of the Spanish language. The gentleman who was in the discharge of the duties of master of the sword at West Point has received the appointment of professor of Spanish. The professor of French has never been in the Army, nor has the professor of drawing.

Mr. QUITMAN. Allow me to make one remark. I did not intend to say that they were commissioned officers of the Army; but when they received their appointments, they received commissions in the same form that every officer of the Army receives his.

Mr. PHELPS. I am coming to that point soon. My point is this, that, from the time this Military Academy was established by the legislation of Congress up to 1850, these professors at the Military Academy at West Point held assimilated rank and received the pay and emoluments of certain grades of officers of the United States Army. But in 1850 Congress changed the mode of paying these men, and provided that their compensation should be an annual salary of $2,000. I refer to the act of 1850 making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy. The provision is in these words:

"Provided, That hereafter in lieu of pay proper, ordinary rations, forage, and servants, heretofore received under the provisions of the act of April 12, 1812, the professors of engineering, philosophy, mathematics, ethics, and chemistry, shall be entitled to receive $2,000 each, and the professors of drawing and Spanish $1,500 each per annum."

The compensation of these professors at the Military Academy was fixed at an annual salary instead of pay proper and rations. The construction given to that act was that it did not deprive these professors of their service rations, and from that time to the present they have been in the receipt of commutation pay for their service rations. The act of the last session of Congress, by which the pay of the officers of the Army of the United States was increased twenty dollars per month, was as follows:

"That, from and after the commencement of the present fiscal year, the pay of each commissioned officer of the Army, including military storekeepers, shall be increased twenty dollars per month, and that the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be thirty cents per ration."

It was the opinion of the Attorney General that the professors at the West Point Military Academy could not be detailed for service on court-martial, not one of them holding a commission in the Army as being of the engineer or any other corps. My construction, then, of the act of the last session is, that that law did not increase the pay of the professors of the West Point Military Academy—that that act only increased the pay of commissioned officers of the Army, and the pay of military storekeepers, who are particularly mentioned. The words used are "commissioned officers of the Army." Now, these professors hold no grade or rank in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is now closed, under the order of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. What I wished to say further is this: I should be in favor, if it were proper, of increasing the pay of these professors to $2,240 per annum; but I cannot vote to increase their pay in the way proposed by the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. J. GLANCY JONES's amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and READY were appointed.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 50, noes 69.

Mr. HUGHES. I move the following amendment:

From lines sixteen and seventeen strike out the words "repairs and improvements;" from line seventeen the word "forage;" from line eighteen the word "transportation;" from lines eighteen and nineteen the words "miscellaneous and incidental expenses, and departments of instruction;" and from lines nineteen and twenty the words "thirty-five thousand;"

so that the paragraph will read, if amended:

For current and ordinary expenses, as follows: fuel and apparatus, postage, stationery, printing, and clerks, six hundred and ten dollars.

Mr. Chairman, most of the items in this paragraph are already provided for. At all events, the language of this paragraph is too general for specific appropriations. What is covered by "departments of instruction," if not what has already been provided for in the bill? What is meant by the word "forage?" There is a previous appropriation "for forage for officers' horses, $864."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. These items of appropriation are usual in this appropriation bill, and if the gentleman will look to the printed estimates, he will see exactly what are provided for down to the minutest detail.

Mr. HUGHES. The question is this: how often are the same items to be lumped in the same bill?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. But once.

Mr. HUGHES. There are appropriations in this bill under the head of "department of instruction," to pay these professors—the instructors. These items seem to be additional to those. I desire to support this bill, and therefore I ask for information. The gentleman says he can give it. Well, I will receive it in the proper spirit. I merely want these items explained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will refer to page 107 of the Estimates, he will find specifically set out all the information he asks for.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is covered in this section by the words "incidental expenses?"

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I suppose that they mean a large variety of things which it is impossible to rehearse.

Mr. HUGHES. Or—to use a common expression—"too tedious to mention."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Yes, sir. These incidental expenses amount to a very small sum. The amendment was again read.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not propose to occupy my five minutes in reply, because the gentleman from Indiana has allowed me to take a portion of his time in answer to his inquiries. As I stated before, the estimates of the Departments are printed for the use of the members of the House, and a copy is laid on the desk of each member at the opening of each session. All the details are given in these estimates, and gentlemen can, at any time, refer to them for information. If a gentleman rises and moves to strike out items, it is incumbent on him to show why. I hope this amendment will not prevail. I confess I do not understand it precisely; but I object to the language of it, even if there were nothing but language in it.

Mr. HUGHES. Appropriations are made for the forage of officers' horses, and of cavalry and artillery horses, and I now want to know what horses are intended to be provided for in the section from which I propose to have words stricken out?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If I understand the gentleman, he means to ask me whether we have made a double appropriation for this?

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, I assure him we have not.

Mr. LEITER. I rise to a question of order. I object to gentlemen addressing each other around the corner. I feel some interest in this matter, and I should like to have them address the Chair. I want to know what question all this controversy is about.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is happy to inform the gentleman from Ohio that the controversy is at an end. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. HUGHES's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk then proceeded with, and concluded, the reading of the bill.

No further amendments being offered—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee now take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 21) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN stated that if there were no objection, the first reading of the bill would be dispensed with.

No objection being made, the first reading was dispensed with.

The reading of the bill by clauses, for amendment, was then commenced.

The following clause being reached—

"For reporting the debates of the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $3,000"

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, said: I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] whether this $8,000 includes the usual additional compensation of $800 each to the reporters of the House?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It does not.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I move to amend the bill, by inserting after that clause the following:

For the usual additional compensation to the reporters for the Congressional Globe, for reporting the proceedings of the House of Representatives for the present session of Congress, being $800 to each reporter, $4,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a point of order. There is no law providing for the amendment which the gentleman proposes to make.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It provides for paying the usual additional compensation to the reporters.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will state that that is provided for in another bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. But I understand that it has been struck out of the deficiency bill in the Senate, because it was not properly in order in that bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no knowledge—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order that the amendment is not in order?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and decides that the amendment is in order. The Chair puts his decision on the ground that this has been provided for by law heretofore.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the Clerk to read the 81st rule.

The 81st rule was read, as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to know of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if an item of the same description was not reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in the deficiency bill? If it is not in order here, on the grounds on which the gentleman places his objection, it was not in order there.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The item to which the gentleman refers was reported in the deficiency bill. The reporters are provided for in that bill. I make the point of order that it is not in order here. I do not propose to argue with the gentleman the point of order as regards the deficiency bill. If the gentleman wants my opinion, I will say that I think it was not in order there. There is no law providing for it. The Chair having overruled my point of order, I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this bill, and that it is in conflict with the 81st rule of the House. The Chair decides that it is in order, because this payment has been provided for by preëxisting laws, during two Congresses, to the knowledge of the Chair.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. J. GLANCY JONES and ADRAIN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 44.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The amendment of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, was then agreed to.

The following clause having been read:

"For the compensation of the draughtsman and clerks employed upon the land maps, clerks to committees, and temporary clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, $23,000"

Mr. STANTON said, I do not believe there is any necessity for continuing these clerks. I move to strike out the words "draughtsman and clerks employed upon the land maps." I suppose that is the only mode in which the House can be called upon to express any opinion as to the propriety of continuing the employment of these clerks. If this appropriation shall be struck out, it will, of course, dispense with these clerks after the 1st of July next. I am not particularly informed about the matter; but I have heard great complaints about the employment of these clerks. It is said that they are not really required; but that the places are needed in order to stow away gentlemen who would like to have comfortable salaries, and for whom it is desirable to provide. I offer the amendment with a view of testing the sense of the committee.

Mr. RUFFIN. In relation to this matter, I would state that some time since a resolution was passed by the House directing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the propriety of repealing the resolution of the 4th of May, 1848, by which this force was established. The Committee on Public Lands, some time since, had the matter under consideration. There was a majority report agreed upon to be submitted by the chairman, and a minority report to be submitted by myself, and we have been endeavoring to get those reports before the House.

I, sir, came to the conclusion, from the replies of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and from the examination of Mr. Amasa R. Parker, the draughtsman of the corps, that these land maps ought to be discontinued. They are kept up now at an annual expense of over sixteen thousand dollars. The draughtsman is paid, if I recollect rightly, $2,160, and there are eight clerks at an annual salary of $1,800 each. It seems to me that this work, as it is now carried on, is of no benefit whatever either to the Committee on Public Lands or to the House. The work is always behindhand. The draughtsman on his examination stated that the work is behind now several months. A large portion of the public lands are in the Territories, and the public lands taken up in those Territories have never been mapped out by those clerks. The majority of the Committee on the Public Lands agreed to a report, that after the 1st of July next, this force should be reduced to one draughtsman and three clerks. The chairman will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. COBB. Two draughtsmen and three clerks.

Mr. RUFFIN. If the force be reduced and the work be extended to the Territories, as the committee will recommend, then the work will never be kept up to date; and, sir, unless it is kept up to date, it will be of no benefit whatever. I have been a member of the Committee on Public Lands during the whole session, and, so far as I have seen, these maps have not been referred to in the investigations which have been made. They have been of no advantage to us that I have seen. I think, with the gentleman from Ohio, that it is high time this matter was looked into, and that this expenditure, useless expenditure, of the public money was stopped.

Mr. Chairman, these map clerks were originally provided for in the year 1848. I am informed by gentlemen who were here at the time, that a majority of this House belonged to the Whig party, and that the Executive Administration was Democratic, and that therefore the House gave the appointment to the Clerk instead of to the Commissioner of the Public Lands, in order that their Whig friends might have the places. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has some letters from the Department on the subject of these clerks and their usefulness, which I hope he will have read for the information of gentlemen of the committee. By those letters it will be seen that these clerks are not only of no benefit to the Government, but are an absolute disadvantage to the public interests. It is complained that these clerks are put in the Land Office, and are not under the control of the head of that bureau; and it has also been complained that they have furnished information to land speculators and land grabbers. From all the information we have received, it would seem that these clerks themselves are the only ones who receive any benefit from their appointment. I have been able to see no reason why this force should be longer continued. I appeal to the gentlemen who talk about reform, and who always say that it is not made in the right place, to look into this matter and take action on it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to draw their appropriation bills in accordance with law. In the year 1848 a resolution passed this House providing for the employment of these clerks. That resolution stands upon the statute-book to this day, and appropriations have been made every year in accordance with it. The estimate for the appropriation in this bill was made by the Clerk of this House under that resolution of 1848.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee did not undertake to pass upon the merits of that resolution, and to decide whether or not it ought to be repealed. They only provided for an appropriation in this bill to satisfy existing law, as it was their duty to do.

Mr. RUFFIN. It was not my intention to cast any reflection upon the Committee of Ways and Means. I am aware of the fact that the resolution of 1848, for the employment of these clerks, still stands upon the Journals of this House, and that it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to provide for an appropriation under it. My object now is to demonstrate to the House that these clerks are unnecessary. There may possibly have been some use for this clerical force when the resolution was adopted; but so far as my experience has gone at the present session, they are not of the slightest benefit.

In the Committee on Public Lands I stood alone in my view of doing away with this force altogether. The committee were of the opinion that the force should be reduced to two draughtsmen and three clerks, and that the work should be extended to the Territories. I was for discontinuing the whole thing. My opinion is, nevertheless, that if the work be extended to the Territories, this reduced force cannot possibly keep up the work to date. I know that the draughtsman, who is chief of the force, gave his testimony before the committee that these clerks labored faithfully and did their duty, and I am not disposed to find fault on that score. But the fact stands, notwithstanding that testimony, that the work is behindhand, and that this force of nine persons have failed to keep the work up so as to make it of benefit to the present Congress.

Mr. CLEMENS obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether the Committee on Public Lands did not report to the Committee of Ways and Means that they desired this work gone on with, and the employment of these clerks continued? Such, at least, was the information brought to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RUFFIN. The Committee on Public Lands agreed to reduce the force to two draughtsmen and three clerks, and that the work hereafter should include the public lands in the Territories.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio; and I will state, in addition to what has been stated by the gentlemen from North Carolina, a fact which has been overlooked; that, by the act of 1836, it is made a penal offense for any clerk of the General Land Office to make use of any of the knowledge he has acquired in regard to the public lands, for private speculation. Under the mode by which these clerks are appointed, they are changed with every change of the Clerk of this House, and these gentlemen, when they are superseded every two years, go out into the world and use the information they have acquired of the public lands, for the purposes of private speculation. I have had access to a paper in the possession of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] signed by the Secretary of the Interior; and urged by that consideration, he recommends either that that force shall be organized under him directly, by his appointment, or that the whole force shall be abandoned. Actuated by that consideration, and by that consideration alone, and desiring to hold these clerks in possession of the keys of knowledge of the whole public land system of our Government to a strict accountability, and desiring, so far as I am concerned, not to throw before the populace and before the speculative men of the West the knowledge acquired in this way, I hope to see this whole system changed, and for that reason, I am in favor of striking out this specific appropriation as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

I think it not necessary for me now to say anything further; but I call upon the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], who has that paper of the Secretary in his charge, to present it to the House, that we may see what the Secretary has to say in reference to this matter.

Mr. COBB. When I get the floor I will explain all this matter.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to say, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, that I have some information upon this subject. I think there is an entire misapprehension between the Secretary of the Interior and the Clerk of the House upon that subject. The act of Congress which creates this corps, expressly provides that they shall be under the superintendence and control of the Secretary of the Interior, but because the Secretary of the Interior happens not to have the appointing power, this difficulty has arisen. He desires to have the patronage, and the Clerk desires to have it. Congress bestowed it upon the Clerk, and because, forsooth, it is bestowed upon the Clerk, the Secretary of the Interior makes the objection that these clerks are not subject to his control. The act of Congress makes them subject to his control. They are subject to the same rules as other clerks in that Department. The report of the Secretary of the Interior is founded upon a mistake, clear, plain, and palpable. We discussed and examined that matter in the committee, and we were satisfied that he did not understand it.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in what way they can be brought under the operation of the act of 1836, when, by the very terms of their appointment, they are not Clerks of the Land Office? They are mere supernumeraries appointed by the Clerk of this House. It is not an Executive appointment, nor a Department appointment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The gentleman asks how it comes that they are responsible to the Secretary of the Interior? I say it is because the act of Congress makes them so.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Certainly.

Mr. LETCHER. There was no Secretary of the Interior at the time this resolution passed, to whom the clerks could be responsible in any way. Here is the resolution under which they were appointed. It is indefinite in its terms. It was passed on the 4th day of May, 1848, on motion of Mr. COLLAMER, of Vermont:

"Resolved, That there be prepared, by the procurement of the Clerk, for the use of the House, and the Committee thereof on Public Lands, a map of the public lands in each State, showing the state of the survey, and also what has been sold; that the same be prepared under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that such may be revised and extended after each session of Congress."

By referring to Miscellaneous Documents for the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, it will be found that at that time there was a draughtsman at a salary of $1,500, and six clerks at a salary of $1,200 each, in charge of this work. Now we have one draughtsman at a salary of $2,160, and eight clerks at a salary of $1,800 each. The resolution provides no pay. It has gone on increasing in that way without any authority of law at all.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The resolution is just exactly as I stated, except that the office of Secretary of the Interior was created afterwards; but it produces precisely the same result. It is in these words:

"That there be prepared by the procurement of the Clerk, for the use of the House and the Committee thereof on Public Lands, a map of the public lands in each State, showing the state of the survey, and also what has been sold; that the same be prepared under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office," &c.

Now, after the date of that resolution, an act of Congress was passed creating the office of Secretary of the Interior, and giving him the control possessed previously by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and placing him at the head of that particular Department. The work was to be done by the clerks operating under the supervision and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Secretary of the Interior was afterwards given control over him; and I now ask why it is that the Secretary of the Interior, as gentlemen say, has not complete control over the clerks, and over the Commissioner himself? The Commissioner is but his creature, and under his control, and the clerks are under the control of both; and yet we are told gravely by the Secretary of the Interior, in his report, that they may communicate their information improperly. I deny it. They dare not do it for a single moment; and, further than that, they have never done it. There is no instance where any communication has gone abroad in that way.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask my colleague if the Secretary of the Interior has not recommended a repeal of that resolution? My colleague knows that the Secretary of the Interior would never recommend a disregard of law, by merely refusing to pay a debt of the Government. And I wish to state further that the proposition now is merely to refuse to pay such debt. If it is stricken out of the appropriation bill, the effect will be that the Clerk will still have to appoint these men, and the work will be done; and next year you will owe these gentlemen that amount of money, and must pay them or repudiate the debt. The remedy is to repeal the resolution.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to say, if I can get along without these interruptions, that I will examine that matter. In the first place the Secretary of the Interior sent this communication to the Committee on Public Lands. I say he made a palpable mistake in his communication. But, sir, this is not the proper time to investigate this question, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he should withdraw his amendment, for the reason that there is a report to be made by the Committee on Public Lands, which embraces this whole question. In that report there is a recommendation made that the force be reduced to a certain number. When that report comes in, then this question will arise, and, of course, although we may pass the general appropriation, if the clerks are not employed they will not be paid. When that question arises we will have all the information before us, and can discuss it freely and fully. But at the present time the information is not before the House. We have not the light necessary to an understanding of the subject. When that report comes in there will be no difficulty in understanding it.

Mr. STANTON. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that I will withdraw my amendment if he or some other gentleman will offer an amendment changing the amount to be appropriated, so as to provide only for the reduced force, as recommended by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If the gentleman will modify his amendment in that way, it will be all right.

Mr. STANTON. I am willing to trust the matter to the committee which has charge of the subject.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to say, in order to prepare the mind of the House for the investigation of this subject hereafter, that I deem this work indispensably necessary. You might as well send a boy to school, and tell him to study geography without giving him the use of a map, as to appoint a Committee on Public Lands, and require that committee to provide for appropriating lands to build railroads, and so forth, and report information to you in reference thereto, without giving them these maps. There was an old system in vogue many years ago, in which the earth was described and geography taught merely by written or verbal description, the eye grasping no picture of the countries; and the man who studied geography in that way was never perfect; but when you go into the room of the Committee on Public Lands and cast your eye upon these maps, at one single glance you see every acre of land that has been donated by Congress for the construction of railroads or for any other purpose of a public character. Every acre that has been thus appropriated is marked there.

Mr. RUFFIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Certainly.

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish to know of him if there is, at this time, a single one of these maps in the room of the Committee on Public Lands? if they were not left in the old committee-room amongst the rest of the useless lumber?

I wish to ask the gentleman, further, if the draughtsman whom we had before us did not state that the work was not up to date? The gentleman says that you may see upon these maps all the land that has been donated by Congress. Now, there was a donation to Minnesota, and I understand that there is no map showing those lands.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Sixty, if you wish.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to "account for the milk in the cocoa nut." Has not the gentleman got an appointee—some gentleman from his district—in this particular department?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Not a man. I never got an appointment from the Clerk. I was so unfortunate as to receive none. No, sir; there is no appointee of mine there.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] says that there is no map of Minnesota Territory. I wish to say to him that the Territories are excluded by the resolution of the House in reference to furnishing maps.

Mr. RUFFIN. Certainly they are. That is what I stated.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The resolution embraced the States only, and maps have been prepared exhibiting clearly and satisfactorily all the public lands which have been donated to the States. Of course, they are never up to date, because it is a month or two before we receive communications from the Land Office as to the lands selected. But as soon as it is possible the information is placed upon the map for the benefit of every person who chooses to inspect it.

The gentleman from North Carolina says that these maps have not been brought from the old committee-room. We moved about two weeks ago; and because these maps have not yet been transferred from the old to the new committee-room, that is to be made a grave argument upon this floor against the continuance of this system! They are there in the old committee-room, and are valuable property. They give intelligence that can be procured from no other source. They are indispensably necessary to the acquisition of that information which is requisite to the proper understanding of any question that comes before us in relation to the public lands. You can see upon these maps every acre that has been sold, every acre that has been donated, every acre of swamp lands, every acre that has been granted to the States, just as clearly as you can see the rivers and cities upon a map of the world. Is it of no importance that this information should be placed within the reach of the committee at a single glance of the eye? Or are we to have to go to the General Land Office for information whenever we are called upon to appropriate public lands? I say that the maps are of the highest importance and indispensably necessary; and if any gentleman doubts it, let him examine them for himself.

Talk about economy, indeed! Sir, I have no respect for that kind of economy that is always attacking the salary of the poor laboring man that desires to clutch the pittance from the man who earns his daily bread in one of your Clerk's offices. You are expending millions in prodigal extravagance of every kind, and yet, no man steps forward to stop the great leak, but when the salary of the poor man, who toils for his bread and has a family dependent on his industry, is in question, why, then we hear about economy.

Mr. STANTON. I will withdraw my amendment, and move to strike out $25,000, and to insert $17,800 in lieu of it. I understand that that is the amount which will be required to meet this expenditure under the action of the majority of the Committee on Public Lands. The salaries of the clerks with whose services the committee propose to dispense, amount to $7,200.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman how many of the clerks he proposes to dispense with?

Mr. STANTON. I am informed that the committee propose to dispense with the services of clerks whose salaries amount to $7,200.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. How many of the nine clerks does that dispense with?

Mr. STANTON. I do not know. I only know that their salaries amount to $7,200.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I have been endeavoring for some time to obtain the floor, in order that I might present this case precisely as it stands. The resolution of 1848, under which these clerks were appointed, has already been read. The resolution of the House of January 18, 1858, referring this question of the continuation of these clerks to the Committee on Public Lands, is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the resolution of the 4th of May, 1848, directing the Clerk to procure maps of the public lands in each State, and directing that said maps be revised and extended after each session of Congress."

We have had the subject under consideration, and have been ready to report upon it for several weeks, and I might almost say months, as we have also been ready to report upon much other business that has been referred to the committee.

The members of the Committee on Public Lands have now a large number of bills which they are also ready to report to this House, bills which look to practical and beneficial legislation. I have a resolution to report, by instruction of that committee, in reference to these very map clerks, but as yet I have had no opportunity to do so.

Mr. Chairman, the question as to what action the House should take in reference to these map clerks lies in a nutshell. The information which I have from the Departments I will present, and ask that it may be read as a part of my speech. When the Clerk has read the letters which I will send to him I will make some commentaries upon them, and show what action is proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

The Clerk read the letters, as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: Your note, asking my views of the repeal or modification of the resolution of May 4, 1848, directing the Clerk to procure maps of public lands, &c., is received.

In reply, I have the honor to state, that the necessity of a continuance of that work will be better understood by the Public Lands Committee than the head of this office.

I will only say that, if the work is to be continued, a less force than is now provided for by law cannot keep it up, unless the quantity of lands coming into market, and being sold and otherwise disposed of, should be greatly decreased, which is not very probable for some time to come.

If the work is continued, it ought to be kept as near up to date as possible, which, if done, will require the present clerical force.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.,

J. C. ALLEN, Clerk.

Hon. W. R. W. COBB, Chairman.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 8, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, inquiring, on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, whether in my opinion,

1st. "The construction of the maps of the States now being constructed under the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th of May, 1848, is necessary;" and whether it would be better to have them constructed under the direction of this office, or the Clerk of the House?

2d. How many clerks are required to perform that labor, and whether similar maps of the Territories should not also be prepared?

3d. "How much of the time of the nine clerks on the work during the last Congress was bestowed on the execution of the same?"

In answer to the first inquiry, I have to state that in the opinion of this office, the construction of these maps is not necessary; certainly not to this office, in the preparation of answers to calls from the House or committees, our statistics and data being prepared wholly irrespective of those maps, and without reference to or reliance thereon; but if a different view than this be taken, the work, in the opinion of this office, should be done under the entire control, and by appointees of the Secretary of the Interior.

To the second inquiry, it is the opinion of this office, that if the work is continued, the number of employees should be limited, so as not to exceed three* in number, and that it should embrace the Territories.

To the third inquiry, I inclose herewith a copy of Mr. A. R. Parker's letter of this date, representing that the time, equal to the labor of six clerks, was occupied on this work within the given period mentioned.

I beg leave to add that the present arrangement is one of great inconvenience to us, as we have no control over the clerks employed in this business, and who have free access to books and papers not allowed to any other persons, and consequently without any responsibility in the matter to the Department in charge of the land archives and the administration of the public lands for which it is responsible.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

THOS. A. HENDRICKS,

Commissioner.

Hon. W. R. W. COBB, Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1858.

SIR: The Commissioner of the General Land Office has prepared his reply, dated the 8th instant, to your letter of the 4th instant, addressed to him, in which you propounded certain inquiries concerning the employment, under provisions of the act of Congress of May 4, 1848, by the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, of persons who perform their duties in the General Land Office, and who have free access to the records and files of that office.

* Mr. Parker, in charge of this matter, as I am orally informed, is of opinion, that in ordinary times four clerks would be sufficient, but that in view of the railroad grants, he could employ a dozen if he had the room, for a short time.

His reply has been submitted to me for transmission to you, which is accordingly done; and I take occasion to state that the sentiments of his letter are fully approved and concurred in by me.

By the act of Congress of July 4, 1836, the clerks and officers of the General Land Office are "prohibited from directly or indirectly purchasing, or in any way becoming interested in the purchase of the public lands;" and to insure integrity and attention to business, regulations have also been adopted, from time to time, forbidding officers and clerks of the Department from availing themselves of special information obtained in the line of official duty, for purposes of private speculation.

The persons employed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the General Land Office are not subject to the same laws and regulations and liable to the same penalties; nor are they accountable for the manner in which they use the records and files of the Land Office, to the officer charged by law with their custody.

In this there is manifest inequality, impropriety, and injustice. The arrangement is one tending to confusion and delay in the discharge of the regular business of the Land Office; and exposes the Department to the risk of any odium that might ensue from an abuse of position, in a case in which it has not the proper corrective power.

When we consider that the arrangement alluded to involves a manifest departure from the general plan of organization of the legislative and executive branches of our Government under the Constitution, it is evident that the business provided for by the act of 4th May, 1848, should be intrusted by law to the executive authority, or at once abandoned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. W. R. W. COBB, Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the United States House of Representatives.

Pending the reading of the papers, Mr. MONTGOMERY said: Mr. Chairman, are all these papers pertinent to an appropriation to carry out an existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. If objection be made the Chair will rule that it is not in order to have them read by the Clerk.

Mr. COBB. Then I will read them myself; but I think the Clerk had better read them, as he can do it more satisfactorily.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It will be time enough to have these papers read when the committee makes its report.

Mr. LEITER. I trust that the gentleman will go up to the Clerk's desk, and read the papers himself. Let us have light on the subject.

Mr. COBB. There is no further objection to the reading of the papers, I presume.

The Clerk then read the letters through.

Mr. COBB. After receiving those letters, and going into a full investigation of the subject, the Committee on Public Lands instructed me to report this resolution:

Resolved, That there shall be maps of the Territories as well as of the States constructed under the resolution of the House of the 4th of May, 1848, and that there shall not be more than two draughtsmen and three clerks employed upon said maps after the 30th of June next.

That resolution does not entirely conform to the view which I entertain, but I am compelled to submit.

Mr. Chairman, my worthy colleague on the Committee on Public Lands, has gone all over this subject. He commenced as far back as 1848, and came down to the present session of Congress. It will not be improper for me, then, to refer to the subject briefly. The resolution authorizing the employment of this clerical force was passed, as has been already stated, in the year 1848. It was reported from the Committee on Public Lands by Mr. COLLAMER, who was its chairman at that day. The Executive Administration was Democratic, but this House was in the power of the old Whig party, the real, out-and-out, simon-pure Whig party. The appointment of these clerks was given to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in order that the patronage created under the resolution should be enjoyed by the Whig friends of the majority of the House. After a while, the Democratic party came into power in this House, and proposed no change in the law, but allowed Democrats to supersede the Whigs who had been previously appointed. At the last Congress, the majority of this House was Republican; and however much I might have desired a change in the law, and to have placed the appointment and control of these clerks in the Secretary of the Interior, while this patronage was about the only patronage that party had, I stood no chance of accomplishing that object. We have now in the Committee on Public Lands six anti-Administration men and three Administration men, and they have recommended the adoption of the resolution I have read. It is for the House to adopt that report.

Mr. STANTON. What do you mean by anti-Administration men?

Mr. COBB. I refer to some who have gone off on the Kansas question.

In my view of the question, I am sustained by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There ought to be some efficient control of these clerks. There is no penalty attached now to their use of the information they may gain of the public lands. There ought to be such a penalty, we all admit, and I hope that matter will be provided for when the question comes up in the House.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. I wish it understood that when I have the floor I want to go on in my own way. It has been my misfortune to be constantly interrupted whenever I get up to address the House. I do not care to be interrupted now.

When the resolution of 1848 was passed, the maps of all the land States were perfectly blank. The then Whig Administration appointed three clerks and one draughtsman for the purpose of marking off the lands taken in the several States; and that force proved to be quite large enough for the purpose. Since then, the maps of three or four States have been almost entirely covered up. The map of Ohio has but few blank spots upon it. In Indiana, there are but few tracts of public lands vacant; and it seems to me that if four clerks were enough for the performance of these duties when they were first appointed, five ought certainly to be enough now, although we have agreed to a resolution to extend this work to the Territories.

Now, in regard to the utility of the work, I must differ, to some extent, with my friend from North Carolina—my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands—[Mr. RUFFIN.] I always believed that this work was necessary for the guidance of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the House. When propositions for giving lands to railroads are under consideration, the information supplied by this work is absolutely necessary, to enable us to arrive at something like correct conclusions. We have no such bills before us this session for any of the States that have heretofore received grants for railroad purposes, and therefore we have had no use for these maps. I am satisfied that these maps ought to be kept up, although I believe that no more grants of lands for railroad purposes will be made to such State.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama that his count of the Committee on Public Lands is not correct; because, if voting against the Administration, or against some measure recommended by the Administration, places us on the list of anti-Administration men, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands himself [Mr. Cobb] is on that list, as he voted against the deficiency bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I used that language more playfully than seriously. If I should soon again have occasion to make another speech, and to analyze the elements of the Committee on Public Lands, I would probably make a different report. But now I will answer the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUFFIN.]

Mr. RUFFIN. I want the gentleman to explain this state of facts: It is stated that these maps are behindhand in the different States—that in some of the States they are behindhand so far as four or five months. Is that so? If it be, of course they can be of no benefit to us at this session. The gentleman also speaks of there being no proposition now before the Committee on Public Lands for grants for railroad purposes in any of the States. I would ask the gentleman if there is not an important measure now before that committee relative to a grant of lands, or a sale of lands, for railroad purposes in Iowa, on an entirely new principle?

Mr. COBB. We have such a proposition before us. But, so far as that is concerned, we need not have these maps marked out up to date, for the reason that the proposition inaugurates quite a new principle in the mode of donating public lands. It proposes that the corporators in this railroad shall pay the Government price of $1 25 an acre for the land they get, within a certain length of time. The more they get, the better for the Government.

Mr. LETCHER. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order. He has no right to disclose the secrets of the committee.

Mr. COBB. I know, sir, that it is rather out of order. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I believe that if the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] be adopted, to reduce the appropriation to $17,800, it will meet the views of the majority of the Committee on Public Lands, who are most decidedly of opinion that two draughtsmen and three clerks are all that are required to keep these maps.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. At that point I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. COBB. Oh, yes; I can answer it, I am sure; but do not put too hard a one. [Laughter.]

Mr. BILLINGHURST. It is pertinent to the line of argument which the gentleman is now pursuing. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say that the Committee on Public Lands have agreed to report in favor of reducing this force to two draughtsmen and three clerks. If that be so, how can this appropriation of $17,800 be necessary?

Mr. COBB. Oh, this same clause provides also for temporary clerks, clerks to committees, &c.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Then the whole of it is not intended to go to these draughtsmen and map clerks?

Mr. COBB. Oh, no. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio covers the whole ground, and I do not deem it necessary to trouble the House with any further remarks on that subject.

A MEMBER. Give us a speech on Kansas.

Mr. COBB. I do not believe I shall give you a Kansas speech, although I have been exceedingly anxious during the session to make one. I fear that, in all probability, I might get into too deep water, as I do not understand the exact turn that politics may take here. [Laughter.] I will wait till the bill comes in for the last time.

Now, in reference to my making a speech, I desire to say that I am determined, in all my speeches upon this floor, to confine myself to matters of practical legislation. When I say this, I appeal to the committee to sustain me in the declaration, that whenever I have occupied the floor, I have not spoken except to the question before the House. The committee, too, will bear in mind that every word I have uttered during the present Congress has not occupied more than seventeen minutes. I have made a very accurate calculation. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Except your speech to-day.

Mr. COBB. Oh! of course, excepting to-day. Now, by a rule of the House of Representatives, passed upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN], at an early day of the session, the Committee on Public Lands cannot make their reports, after that committee have been once passed, until all the other committees are called again. Now look at the bundles of papers I have here [here Mr. Cobb held up to the view of the committee two large bundles of papers] containing favorable as well as unfavorable reports. You will see that it must require an immense amount of labor to arrive at anything like a correct conclusion, and to ascertain the facts in relation to the subject-matters contained in all these papers. And I now, Mr. Chairman, admonish the House through you, to proceed to the regular order of business every day, advancing as rapidly as possible, in order that the Committee on Public Lands may be called again, so that we may present some subjects which call for legislation. If we cannot be heard, we will be unable to report several bills in these bundles, which have been recommended as necessary and important to be passed, in order to facilitate action in reference to our land system in the West.

I was going to state that, so far as practical legislation is concerned, the distinguished Committee on Public Lands, composed of the materials to which I have referred, in all probability have done more hard work, have investigated more complicated questions, and are now ready to make more reports than any other committee of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COBB. I was coming to the case of my friend from Virginia. Unlike the Committee of Ways and Means—that distinguished committee which is held up as the most important committee of this House—I take pleasure in saying that the Committee on Public Lands is the most important committee in the House. Why? The vast questions which relate to our public domain must necessarily come under our supervision. We are bound to examine the laws, and see what defects there may be, and to ascertain the causes of the difficulties which so often embarrass the settlers upon our public lands. Our committee have labored faithfully, and we are now prepared to present a large mass of matter for practical legislation.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I rise to a question of order. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is blowing his own horn, and he has no right to do so. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COBB. How does the Chair decide the point of order? [Renewed laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That the gentleman from Alabama has the floor, and has the right to proceed.

Mr. COBB. I thank the Chair for that much liberality.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] and to my friend from Tennessee over there, [Mr. JONES,] who, I see, is looking rather cross at me just now, [laughter,] that, so far as the action of the Committee on Public Lands, up to this day, is concerned, they need not fear any action which will be taken by that committee; for I expect that, when they come to examine the matters reported by that committee, they will vote for nine out of ten of them. Therefore, they need not have any fear of our committee ruining the Government. We are going to make it a model committee.

But to return to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is held that the Committee of Ways and Means is, perhaps, the most important committee of the House. It is an important committee, but what are the duties of that committee? They have all the estimates sent to them, and they have to examine them. Their labors are arduous I know. But so far as the duty of investigating questions is concerned, they have scarcely nothing to do, unless in the case of some improper appropriations now and then. There was a bill from that committee before us a few days ago, and I chose to vote against it on account of an appropriation which it contained. And I take the liberty now to state that it was not on the ground that it was an appropriation bill to carry on the Utah war. I would vote for that to-day, if it were cut loose from everything else. Some of my political friends voted against it too, and the Union read us out of the party. But I would have voted for that particular appropriation if left by itself.

Well, unlike the Committee of Ways and Means, as I was saying, we have to take into consideration everything connected with the land laws. We have to inquire into the practical workings of the mode of disposing of our public lands. Sir, you must be aware of the importance of that committee, and the labor necessarily imposed upon it. These are duties which no clerk can discharge. Each case must be investigated by the members of the committee, and I can assure you that we have had a heavy amount of labor to perform. I do not want to attach any particular honor to being chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. [Laughter.] It would be unparliamentary to do so. I am now ascribing to my worthy colleagues on the committee the honor to which I believe they are entitled. They have done their work manfully. They have endeavored to act properly upon such cases as have been referred to them. They have given them a fair consideration, and have been waiting for weeks for an opportunity to report. But, if the regular order of business is not insisted upon, we shall not be able to report upon another case this session.

It rust, sir, that the regular order of business will be insisted on every day during the morning hour, and that the call of committees will be continued until we come down again to the Committee on Public Lands, when we may have an opportunity to disgorge some of these papers with which our desks are now filled.

I have here, sir, ready to report, a bill in which every member of the House is interested, or at least in which some of the constituents of every member of the House are interested. I made an application to the Speaker the other day, when the committees were being called for reports of a private character, to know whether a general bill, founded upon private applications, could be received under that call. I knew it was not in order, but inasmuch as I design to ask the House to put the bill upon its passage when I report it, I determined to bring it to the notice of the House; and there was no other way in which I could do it. The bill was printed in the Globe, in the proceedings of the House of Friday last, for the benefit of members. I shall ask the House to put that bill upon its passage. I have only asked two similar favors this session, and each time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] has objected. I now appeal to the gentleman, in advance, not to object in this case.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Can the gentleman inform us when the committee of conference on the Kansas bill is going to report? [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir, I think I can, if the gentleman will answer me one question, first. It is a Yankee mode of answering, but I am not a Yankee; I was born in Tennessee and raised in Alabama; and I want it to be understood that I am representing the people that raised me. [Laughter.] If the gentleman will answer me one question, I think I can tell him when the committee of conference will report.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will if I can.

Mr. COBB. When will the difficulties between the Democrats and the few anti-Lecomptonites be settled so as to harmonize the party?

Mr. GIDDINGS. As soon as we Republicans get the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Whenever we have settled our difficulties you may look for a report; and my opinion is that you need not look for one until that is the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOVEJOY moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SEWARD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1859, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass; also, that the committee had had under consideration House bill (No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending 30th June, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the President of the United States had, on the 19th inst., approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless; and

An act for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of State to audit and settle the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States Marine Hospital at San Francisco, California; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the usual resolution to close the debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon House bill No. 200—the civil appropriation bill—in one hour after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to strike out one hour, and insert three hours.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, (the House then) at half past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 22, 1858.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, information relative to the condition of the United States ship Susquehanna on her arrival at the Island of Jamaica, and the reception and assistance extended to her officers and crew by the British authorities in that island; which was, on motion of Mr. MASON, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending the 30th of September, 1857.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Printing. I am strongly of the impression that we are going to have another book out of it.

Mr. IVERSON. It should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to that; but if there is a motion to print, I want that to go to the Printing Committee.

The document was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and a motion to print it to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the memorial of Ann Gratiot, widow of Brevet Brigadier General Charles Gratiot, late of the United States Army, praying to be allowed his pay and emolument as colonel and chief of engineers of the Army, from the date of his dismissal to the time of his death; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented the petition of George A. Wheelock, for himself and the other heirs of Joseph Villere, deceased, praying the reference of their claim to the Court of Claims, and that the same may not be barred by limitations; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEWARD. I present the answer and remonstrance of the American Telegraph Company to the memorial of the Magnetic Telegraph Company and the New England Union Telegraph Company, and the supplement thereto. This memorial and remonstrance complains that the papers against which they remonstrate do injustice to the company, insist that the measure which they seek is unjust, that it would bring the Government of the United States into conflict with State authorities in the regulation of private enterprise for the transaction of telegraph business; and that Congress have no power to pass such an act as is prayed for by the applicants. I move that this paper be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that the memorial may be printed as the former memorial was printed.

It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. B. Williams, in behalf of the heirs of Joseph Biggs, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petitions of Hugh Ferguson and James Robb, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 29) to refer the claim of Joseph Villiere, deceased, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 281) to secure a prompt construction of a line of telegraph from San Francisco to Fort Smith, and from thence to St. Louis and to Memphis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

DUTIES ON THE ELBA.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate such information as the Departments of the Government may afford concerning the nature, character, and extent of the State duties exacted from foreign vessels and merchandise, navigating the Elba, by the kingdom of Hanover, the grounds of such exactions, and the practicability and expediency of obtaining for American shipping and merchandise an exemption therefrom.

NORTH PACIFIC OCEAN.

Mr. SEWARD. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its consideration now:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish the Senate with an estimate of the cost of bringing up and preparing for publication the surveys of the late expedition to the North Pacific ocean, and Behning's Straits, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. PUGH. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1859; and a bill donating public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. MASON. If there are no further reports from committees, I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution that was unfinished yesterday, relating to the relations between this Government and that of Paraguay.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 28) for the adjustment of differences with the Republic of Paraguay.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the resolution be amended by striking out the words "and use such force." I do not know that I can secure any attention of the Senate to this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be less conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. COLLAMER. I made the suggestion not on account of the importance of any attention being paid to me, but I would desire that some should be paid to the resolution. Mr. President, the using of force, unless it be mere matter of defense, is war. The use of force to procure redress is war. Disguise it as we may, it is open, flagrant, war; and if the President be authorized by Congress, not merely as a matter of defense when our vessels are attacked, but offensively to use the military force, to draw up a frigate before a city and bombard it for the purpose of procuring redress of grievances, that is war; and I apprehend the honorable Senator from Virginia looks upon it in that light, because he moved to amend it so as to make it a joint resolution, that is, to make it a resolution by both Houses, and acceded to by the President, declaring war.

Now, sir, I do not know, it is not necessary that I should now say, whether there be sufficient reasons shown to us to convince us that we have cause of war, and should declare war against Paraguay or not. The point I am after is this: I insist upon it that Congress, by the Constitution, alone has the power to declare war. I insist, as a matter of constitutional law, that Congress has no power to authorize the President to commence a war at his discretion. They have no such power, and it is an assumption and abuse of the authority which is given by the Constitution. I know that Congress may declare war against Paraguay, but I deny that they can say that the President shall have the right to commence war against Paraguay when he thinks proper. Is not that the proposition?

Argentine Confederation. The precise terms of that confederation I do not know; but I know that the different members of the confederation are frequently at almost open war with each other. We have a treaty with Paraguay, and therefore Paraguay is a nation which we acknowledge as a civilized people. We reciprocate with them, if you please, diplomatic representation. We have formed a treaty with them. It is true, that treaty was not ratified on their part, for a very good reason, because it was kept in the hands of our own commissioners at Buenos Ayres until the time for its operation had expired; and it was never presented to them. I merely mention the fact of our having made such a treaty to show that we recognize them as a civilized people and nation. There have been, as we say, outrages committed by them in firing upon one of our vessels in the river Parana, and also by some depredation upon the property of some of our citizens, who went there with their property at the invitation of that Government. These wrongs require redress. Shall we have it? To me, sir, it is a matter of astonishment that our Government seems to have utterly neglected the calling upon that nation for redress of grievances now for (I do not know exactly how long) three or four years already. The President informs us that he proposes to call upon them for satisfaction. It is right, and it should have been done long ago; but that is not the proposition now made to us. That he should attempt, and undoubtedly will attempt. But what is proposed here? That the President shall be clothed with authority to settle our difficulties with Paraguay, and that he shall use such force as he thinks proper. That amounts to this: you may go to Paraguay, make a demand for satisfaction of these grievances, and if they do not offer the satisfaction which the President thinks proper, he shall bombard their cities and towns, and he may use the Navy and the Army, land upon their shores, and use, under this resolution, the force of the Government to any extent he thinks proper, and upon whatever contingency he thinks proper.

Is not that obviously authorizing the President to commence a war in his discretion? I insist upon it that that is not a proper exercise of the authority of Congress in relation to the subject of war, and that there never was anything of the kind done in this Government before. I do not say that a precedent for it cannot be produced, but I say it will be very extraordinary, if one can be found; and I say that such action as this ought not to be taken by the Senate without a precedent. Take the most enormous outrages you can imagine in our history. When Great Britain fired into our frigate Chesapeake, did Congress authorize the President to exercise force against them? Never at all in any period of our history, in any outrage which has ever been committed upon our people, or the property or dignity of the nation, was a step of this kind taken. I know that the President has directed the naval officers, in relation to barbarous people, to go to the Feejee Islands and burn down their villages, when he thought proper to obtain redress of grievances for outrages of theirs committed on our people, on their lives, their property, and their ships. I know that has been done with barbarous and uncivilized people. I know that they bombarded Greytown as being a nest of pirates, or something of that kind, not recognized as having a national existence. But, sir, in relation to a civilized people, a people with whom we have reciprocated diplomatic relations, with whom we have now a consul residing, that you should authorize the President of the United States to use the Army and Navy of the United States to commence a forcible war upon them, in his discretion, when he shall think proper, is entirely unprecedented in our history.

I do not mean hereby to disclaim that redress should be obtained. The President should make proper application for redress. We are not, however, so infallible on this subject, but that it is possible, after all, they may make good excuse for what they have done. Our information is altogether ex parte; we have heard but one side. But, sir, suppose we cannot, and suppose they do not. The President holds his intercommunication through his proper organs with them; hears their story, receives their offers. If they are insufficient and unsatisfactory, he rejects them. He exhausts all the means which he has, by peaceable efforts I mean, to obtain redress. Then he should report to Congress that he has exercised all the power that he has to obtain satisfaction, and has not obtained it, and show us what he has done; what their excuses were; what their offers were, that we may judge whether the time has come to use force, and proceed to open war; but that should be in the discretion of Congress after negotiations shall have been exhausted. Hence that portion of the resolution in relation to using force, I desire to have stricken out.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] who spoke to this question yesterday, suggested that it would be expedient and right, in his judgment, to send a minister, or a diplomatic functionary of some character, to the Government of Paraguay, with a view to institute negotiations for the purpose of redressing the very wanton insult that has been inflicted upon our Government and our people, not only by firing into a public ship without warrant or authority, but in killing one of the men there engaged in public duty. The honorable Senator from Florida thought that all this could be effected simply by sending a minister there, competent to speak the language of that people, and instructed to use terms of kindness and conciliation. His idea was based, as I understood that honorable Senator to say, on some sources of private information which he had, and which were unknown to the Senate. The President of the United States, who is charged by the Constitution with the executive functions of the country, has recommended otherwise, upon official information that he has laid before the Senate. That official information is, that whilst we had one of our public ships there upon a peaceful mission, and in waters not under the jurisdiction of this South American Republic, after the kindest intercourse had previously subsisted between the commander of that ship and the President of the Paraguayan Republic, without notice and without warrant, it was fired into. What the President of the United States proposes, is not that we should send an armament there for the purpose of making war upon this predatory Republic, but that we should demand from them proper and adequate redress; and if it was not extended, then that he should have authority to use whatever force might be necessary to compel them to extend it. That is the recommendation of the President. The language of the annual message is this, after stating this aggression:

"Citizens of the United States, also, who were established in business in Paraguay, have had their property seized and taken from them, and have otherwise been treated by the authorities in an insulting and arbitrary manner, which requires redress."

"A demand for these purposes will be made in a firm but conciliatory spirit. This will the more probably be granted, if the Executive shall have authority to use other means in the event of a refusal. This is accordingly recommended."

Now, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] objects to that part of the resolution which contemplates, in the contingency mentioned, the use of force, and moves to strike it out, because he says that is war. I might deny the proposition of the honorable Senator. It would be hostility, if you please; but it would be hostility returned after hostility commenced on the part of the other Government, and done, of course, under the sanction of Congress. Take the account that was given by the officer in command of that vessel, Lieutenant Jeffers, of the attack that was made upon the steamer Water Witch, under his command. In his official report to Commander Page, (the commander of the ship, who was absent from it at the time,) dated on board the Water Witch, at Corrientes, the 2d of February, 1855, he says:

"On arriving within three hundred yards, [going up the river,] I was hailed by a person who, I am informed, was the Paraguayan admiral; but I did not understand the import of the hail. Two blank cartridges were then fired from the fort in quick succession, and followed by a shot. I had given particular orders that no shot should be fired, except in return, and then only by my directions; and, on receiving this first fire, I directed a general fire in return."

"The first shot of the enemy carried away the wheel, cut the ropes, and mortally wounded Samuel Chaney, the helmsman. A bar was soon shipped, and the vessel steered by it, but with some difficulty, on account of the rapidity of the current. In a couple of minutes after the action had commenced, the pilot deserted his station, and hid himself behind the engine-house. Dragged up thence by Mr. Potts, on looking around him he exclaimed, 'We shall certainly ground, as there is not sufficient water in the channel.' By this time we had run past all the guns of the battery except one; and on learning the state of things, I left the bow gun, which I had been directing, which was no longer serviceable, and took the deck. The pilot, whom I had again to force up to his station, in a high state of excitement, repeatedly exclaimed, 'We shall be aground in a moment,' insisting that we could not pass up. The vessel being then in ten feet water—drawing nine—I was reluctantly compelled to back down past the battery, exposed to a severe fire, which, from the position of the vessel being nearly bows on, I could not return. On getting out of range I anchored, repaired damages, and filled more ammunition, having observed the Paraguayan war steamer Taquari firing up."

Now, sir, if there be war, that war has been begun; it is not to be commenced by the passage of this resolution. There was hostility and bloodshed emanating from this Power with whom we were at peace, and within whose jurisdiction our ship was not at the time when the fire was returned. I certainly should be, as much as the honorable Senator from Vermont or anybody else, against investing the President with power at his discretion to involve this Government in war with any Power, strong or weak; but I know that honorable Senator would be the very last man amongst us who would give any countenance whatever to an aggression of this kind—not only insulting, but accompanied by the shedding of blood and the loss of life by one of our countrymen, under the protection of the flag of his country, and in a foreign water, without provocation, without cause. It is proper, certainly, that, if the President is to act as contemplated by the resolution, if redress should be refused, that he should be authorized to accompany the demand by whatever force he may think necessary to compel justice to be extended.

The honorable Senator said yesterday that the usual course in matters of this kind was for the Executive to make a proper demand for reparation; to enforce it by all possible means in his power; and, after he had exhausted such peaceable measures, if ineffectual, to lay the matter before Congress for its consideration. All the facts of this case have been laid before Congress. We have no minister in that country; we have no diplomatic functionary whatever, and no representative of this Government there.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have at the Argentine Republic.

Mr. MASON. This is not one of the Argentine Confederation. The Argentine Republic is on the opposite side of the Parana river. This is the Republic of Paraguay.

Mr. COLLAMER. Paraguay is one of the members of the Argentine Confederation.

Mr. MASON. Not as I understand it.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is so.

Mr. MASON. It may be so. I have not looked into the varying condition of those countries; but it is stated here as one of the facts of the case, that when Commander Page was on the spot the Province Corrientes, which was one of the Argentine Confederation, was on the opposite side of the river; and that it was under the invitation, public and private, of the Argentine Confederation, that he went up the river Parana.

Mr. COLLAMER. Paraguay is one of the members of the Confederation.

Mr. MASON. I question that still. The language used by Commander Page in his official report to the Department, disclaims that idea, and I suspect he is right. He says this:

"Here is one channel of a river, the common boundary between the Argentine Confederation and Paraguay, claimed by the Government of Paraguay as her exclusive right, because it is more on the Paraguay side of the river; while, with magnanimous generosity, the channel on the Corrientes side, if there be one, is by the same Government declared 'free to all the world.'"

He then goes on to say that this river is the common boundary between these two separate Governments, and that unless by compact it is restricted, they have, by public law, a joint navigation of the river. I think the honorable Senator is mistaken and misinformed, therefore, when he assumes that the Republic of Paraguay is one of the Argentine Confederation.

Mr. COLLAMER. We actually made a treaty with these very Paraguay people.

Mr. MASON. That is very true.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then we have acknowledged that they are a civilized people.

Mr. MASON. That is altogether a different issue. The very fact that we made a separate treaty with them shows that they were not under the Confederation, who alone would be authorized to make treaties.

Mr. COLLAMER. But we are not at liberty to treat them as a barbarous people.

Mr. MASON. That is a different question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator from Virginia be good enough to state what other cause of complaint there is against this Republic besides firing upon the Water Witch?

Mr. MASON. There is no other cause of complaint against this Republic except those which I have stated. The cause of complaint is that this steamer, the Water Witch, had been sent into the waters of the La Plata—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that, but what other than that?

Mr. MASON. None other except her spoliation of the property of American citizens who were there within the Republic of Paraguay—a very large mercantile interest that had been sent out there, I think chiefly from Rhode Island, under invitations from that Government which are set forth in the correspondence, carrying out a large amount of property, several hundred thousand dollars, chiefly in machinery and implements of husbandry, and manufactures of various kinds, which had been set up there and put in successful operation; when, without cause and without notice, they were suddenly broken up and ignominiously expelled from the country, and their property sacrificed. But that is not the cause of complaint for which the President has asked that he should have this power of redress. The chief cause is that one of our public ships, a part of the public force of the United States, not within the jurisdiction of that Power, was thus wantonly and without provocation fired into, and one of her men killed and the ship disabled.

Now, sir, there is no danger of war. The Republic of Paraguay, according to my recollection, is some one thousand five hundred miles from the coast, accessible only after a very long and difficult navigation of their rivers, a very inland country and a very exclusive one, but offering, by her products of dye-wood and other woods of various kinds, and the product of tobacco, very large inducements for commercial intercourse, provided it shall be allowed.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. What was the time this aggression took place? What year?

Mr. MASON. 1856.

Mr. SEWARD. I have referred to a gazetteer on this subject which is authentic, published in the year 1855, and I find that Paraguay is nominally, or was, at that time, nominally an independent Republic in 1855, under the Government of Dr. Lopez, who so early as that is described in this way.

Mr. MASON. I am wrong. The attack was made on the Water Witch in February, 1855.

Mr. SEWARD. Here is what I was about to read from Lippincott's Gazetteer:

"Paraguay declared itself independent of Spain in 1810. From about 1812 to 1840 its affairs were entirely controlled by Dr. Francia, who, being first elected consul, became dictator in 1814, and continued to administer the Government with great ability till his death, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. By a judicious exercise of arbitrary power, he preserved the country from those dissensions and civil wars from which the other South American States have suffered so deeply. His policy of rigorously excluding from his dominions all foreigners, without exception, contributed not only to preserve the tranquillity of the country, but also to consolidate the different elements of the population into one mass, and to form them into a nation. Immediately after his death, the government of a junta of five was established; subsequently, the number was reduced to two; Carlos Antonio Lopez (the present President) acting as civil magistrate, and Mariona Roque Alonzo as the military commandant. In 1846, Lopez was elected President for life. The Republic is divided into partidos or departments, each of which is commanded by a comisionado or commissioner, chosen by the President, to whom alone he is responsible. It not infrequently happens that the commissioner becomes a petty tyrant, and exacts, in the name of the President, not only the services of the poor, but even the property of the wealthy. The army of the Republic was lately raised to forty thousand men."

"The population of Paraguay is variously estimated by different authorities at three hundred thousand, eight hundred thousand, and one million two hundred thousand; it probably does not fall short of one million."

It is not a member of the Argentine Republic. Mr. MASON. The decree of the Republic of Paraguay, under which American citizens were invited there, is set forth in the report, and the extracts set forth in the report are in these terms:

"These decrees set forth that 'the supreme national Government, desiring to develop and stimulate the industry of the great body of the people of the Republic, and considering that one of the means most adequate to this result is to define and secure the conditions and rights of all who shall unite for such useful ends, decree,' among other things, 'article third, that whoever shall introduce into the Republic any foreign discovery, shall enjoy the same advantages as if he was the inventor;' among which advantages, in article fifth, is 'the exclusive enjoyment of the patent for from five to ten years;' and that law was applied by the Secretary of State of that country to an enterprise such as was undertaken by this company, as appears in a letter from that gentleman, then engaged in a special mission to the court of Brazil, addressed to the then late special agent from the Government of the United States to Paraguay, dated Rio Janeiro, December 15, 1848, from which the following extract is submitted: 'In the said decree, President Lopez has resolved all questions which could arise in regard to privileges and premiums. If you introduce into the country machines or new means of industry which the country does not now possess, this decree gives you the monopoly for ten years at least, and you do not require a special concession.'"

It is alleged that in pursuance of these inducements there was a company of merchants, in Rhode Island chiefly, who sent out there some three hundred thousand dollars in various articles of American manufacture, all of which were confiscated by Lopez, the President of the Republic.

The honorable Senator from Vermont says we have acknowledged them as an independent Power by making a treaty with them. Grant it. We make treaties with Indians—

Mr. COLLAMER. Not unless they are within our borders.

Mr. MASON. We have no intercourse with the Indians not within our own jurisdiction, except when we find them in Mexico, and South America, and then we do not make treaties with the Indians, but the Governments, which are composed chiefly of Indians. The fact is, in relation to the Republic of Paraguay, if any gentleman's attention has been called to it, it has been, almost from our first knowledge of it, a despotism under the guise of a Republic, at first in the hands of a certain Dr. Francia, who ruled it with despotic power. Their only law was his will, and a most savage and bloody will it was. He seems to have been succeeded by Lopez, who as President of the Republic has supreme power, and who, whether falsely or not, certainly did, in a false manner, induce American citizens to go there, and has subsequently sequestered and confiscated their property, and driven them off. But, in addition to that, as I have said, he has committed this unprompted and wanton insult upon the American flag in firing upon and killing an American citizen.

I had not anticipated that any objection could be made to the very careful and discreet wording of this resolution. It contemplates that the President should seek redress in a peaceful manner, and if that is not effectual, to resort to arms. We have unsettled questions with more than one of these South American Governments. We have one with Peru; we have one with Venezuela, and it has become rather proverbial; our papers are full of it; our commercial correspondence is full of it—it has become proverbial along the whole coast—

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President—

Mr. MASON. I shall be done in one moment. I wish to say to my colleague that I am aware that one o'clock has come, and that there is a deficiency bill. It has become proverbial in the newspapers all along that whole coast, that while other nations immediately redress wrongs that are committed against their Governments; and therefore are allowed to participate in their commerce, from the character of our Government it is always tardy, and in consequence, by the semi-barbarians proportionally received and respected. I shall say no more.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the special order.

Mr. MASON. If we can take the vote, I suppose it will be allowed.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to say a word in response to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON. Then let it go over.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now call for the special order—being the deficiency bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Virginia give way for one moment? There is a resolution of inquiry which I introduced yesterday, which I should like to have considered. It will not take any time, I think.

Mr. HUNTER. I am told that it will take an hour or two. I cannot give way to anything that will be debated. I will get the bill out of the way, I think, before long, if I shall be allowed to do so.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 109.

Mr. BRODERICK. If the resolution will take an hour or two—

Mr. YULEE. I do not know that it will take an hour or two: The Senator understands the passage of the resolution will be contested.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot give way.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

Mr. HUNTER. When we adjourned yesterday, the pending question was, I think, on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.]

Mr. PUGH. The first question is on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Add at the end of the third section:

And provided further, That it shall never hereafter be lawful for either House of Congress to apply any part of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of such House to any other than the ordinary expenditures of such House; nor to apply any part of said appropriation as extra pay or extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to hear the third section now read as it is proposed to amend it.

The Clerk read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The question is on the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole; which has been read.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the next amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not understand that section three, as amended, has yet been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. I move to strike out that entire section. It has been perfected; and I now move to strike out the third section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that an amendment was offered yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BIGGS] to amend the third section, on which the question should be taken before a motion to strike out. That amendment will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, which is in section three, line six, after the word "Congress," to insert:

Not in contravention of the joint resolution to fix the compensation of the employés in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits thereof, approved July 20, 1854.

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina be adopted, it will cover nearly every case contemplated in the section of the House bill, or all with the exception of a few laborers. It covers the clerks and messengers; and if it be adopted, I think we had better strike out the whole section, for it will not then reach what the House intended. I am told that the clerks of the House committees receive but four dollars per day, being about $540 a year, while our committee clerks receive six dollars per day—quite a difference. I think we had better not adopt this amendment. I believe the section should stand with the amendment that has been already adopted, providing that in future no such appropriations shall be made. That will cover all future cases, and we had better let this section stand as fixed by the House of Representatives, so that they can close their own matters in this respect as they intend to do. Let it be understood that in the future we are to pass no such appropriations. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I think either this amendment ought to be adopted, or else the amendment of the committee, striking out the whole section, should be agreed to. The allowances made by the House of Representatives were in contravention of the law of 1845. The answer given is, that that law, by a common misconception of the executive and legislative departments, was considered as lasting only for one year. Under these circumstances, it would seem reasonable to suppose that the allowances might have been unwittingly made by the House of Representatives. But neither this body nor the House of Representatives certainly has any right to appropriate moneys out of the Treasury, or authorize the expenditure of moneys, directly in the face of the statute law of the land. If allowances have been made in contravention of the joint resolution of 1854, they are a plain violation of law, which must have been known to the House of Representatives as well as to us, against which there could be no answer that it was not now in existence. The House of Representatives were bound to know it as much as the humblest individual in the land, and we are bound to know it. If either House of Congress can take the responsibility of making allowances by its own action, that by the law of the land are prohibited, it would be idle to put in again, as we have done before, a proviso against them. We passed the joint resolution of 1854, prohibiting allowances of this kind, and we have done so at other times. You may repeat these provisos again and again, but if you do not interpose when this irregular and lawless action takes place, it will be idle to insert such provisions in the law hereafter.

There would be a sufficient answer, but for the joint resolution of 1854, founded on the common misconception as to the duration of the law of 1855; but, if these allowances are in contravention of the joint resolution of 1854, no answer can be given; because it then stands plainly that the House of Representatives, I trust inadvertently, have violated the law of the land in authorizing allowances which, by that law, (to the making of which they were actors,) they were bound not to allow. I submit, if this amendment is not adopted, that then, no matter what may be its effect, we ought to strike out the whole section; because it is only by practically stopping the infraction of the law, that you can ever expect it to be enforced—not by mere reiteration of it, session after session, disregarded at the will of an existing majority of either branch.

It may be said, and has been said, that the Clerk of the House of Representatives is obliged to comply with the orders of the House, and that he has paid out money under these allowances, and that therefore you are placing him in a false position. That can be remedied. If the fact be so, all that is necessary will be, either on a private bill or in a clause attached to the appropriation bill, to authorize the payment of the money bona fide paid by him under the allowances of the House of Representatives. There will be no difficulty in protecting an innocent man, who has acted under authority, even though the act was illegal; but to leave this section in the bill is to sanction all these allowances made directly in violation of law. I should be as much indisposed as any one to interfere with the appropriation, by the House of Representatives, of its contingent fund, or its payments to its officers; but that body, in common with the Senate, have thought there were abuses which required to be checked by the passage of the joint resolution of 1854; it is their act as well as ours; and if they and we are not bound to respect the law of the land, how are we to expect a citizen in his individual capacity to obey a law which is put at defiance by one of the organized bodies which constitute the Government?

Mr. BIGGS. I really do not know, sir, but that the effect of this amendment will be as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts; but whether it has that effect or not, it is right in itself, and ought to be adopted, in my humble opinion. I am not going to detain the Senate, except merely to read the legislation on this subject. Here is an act passed in 1854, by which the compensation of these officers that I propose to strike out of this bill was increased twenty per cent. upon the compensation then received by them respectively, with a proviso "that the usual extra compensation shall not hereafter be allowed to any person receiving the benefits of this joint resolution." Now they come forward in violation of this law, and ask additional compensation, as provided for in this bill. Both Houses, at the first session of the last Congress, passed resolutions allowing this extra compensation, but it could not in consequence of this joint resolution be allowed by the accounting officers, and therefore it became necessary to put it in the appropriation bill. When we put that in the appropriation bill for the first session of the last Congress, we expressly reaffirmed the joint resolution of 1854, directly re-enacted that joint resolution in the law that I read yesterday, and which the Senator from Louisiana has now before him. What more could be done by Congress, and what more flagrant violation of that joint resolution, passed in 1854, and reaffirmed in 1857, than now to pass extra compensation by this bill, when the very officers who received it are expressly prohibited, by the law under which their present salaries were raised, from receiving any extra compensation thereafter?

I am very frank to say, having seen this joint resolution, of which I was not aware at the time the first amendment was moved by me, that all officers receiving the benefit of this joint resolution ought to be excluded from the benefits of this third section. It is nothing but right; it is nothing but proper; and, if we hope ever to get clear of this abuse, admitted on all hands to be an abuse, I see no other way to do it. There has been an effort already to get clear of it, and that is insufficient; but, if we vote this appropriation now, in the face of the joint resolution of 1854, and the action of the last Congress on the 3d of March, 1857, we in substance say that this abuse is to be continued indefinitely. I am opposed to it, and shall certainly vote to strike out the whole section, if this amendment does not prevail.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to argue this question at all; but I have been requested to make a statement or two to the Senate, in order that the matter may be distinctly understood, it being supposed that there was a misapprehension on the minds of many Senators—there certainly was on mine—in regard to the true state of the facts. The Clerk of the House of Representatives made certain payments, for which receipts have been given; and those payments and those receipts, so far as they were exhibited to the Treasury Department, have been placed in a document, and are before us, or alluded to by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter, which I believe is in No. 11 of the documents accompanying the annual report, states that, so far as the payments which have been made by the Clerk are concerned—and that is the principal matter in controversy, amounting to several thousand dollars—they are not affected by the joint resolution of 1854 which has been alluded to. That is his construction. He says:

"The joint resolution of July 20, 1854, provided that the usual extra compensation should not thereafter be allowed to the officers who received the benefits of that law in the increase of their salaries. The term 'extra compensation,' as here used, referred to the extra pay which, for a number of years, had been voted to the clerks and employés of the Senate and House by resolutions of those bodies. It is not pretended that the payments now made by the Clerk are of that character; and I do not think, therefore, that this joint resolution applies to these cases."

That is the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the main provision in regard to the payments that have been made. I was right, then, in my supposition, the other day, that according to the understanding of the Secretary of the Treasury, this case was only affected by the construction which the Secretary of the Treasury placed upon that provision of the law of 1845 which has been considered obsolete.

I am further informed, and I have no doubt it is so, that the effect of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, reduced to practice, would simply be to give the extra pay provided for in the resolution of last year, by the House of Representatives, to the pages, and the Capitol police, and the clerks in the employ of the Committee on Printing, and stop there. It would cut off all the clerks of committees and clerks and messengers of the House, except with relation to those payments which have been made and which do not refer to the extra compensation, but are payments running back for some period.

Another consideration I have been requested to state, and there is some force in it. It has been said here that the House of Representatives went on in violation of the understanding of the two branches of Congress—that they chose to act independently of the Senate in relation to this matter. That is clearly a misapprehension. One of the very last things which was done by the Senate at the last session, was to pass a joint resolution allowing this extra pay to our own clerks and employes. That resolution was offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and was sent to the House of Representatives, and the House agreed to it, and it was sent to the President, and the President omitted to sign it for want of time or some other reason.

Mr. TOOMBS. He refused to sign it, very properly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand that he did.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know that he refused to sign it; and he did right, too.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Whether he did right or wrong, I do not comment on; I am stating the fact. The House of Representatives then, in contravention of what the President had done, voted to pay these employes out of their contingent fund, but not in contravention of what the Senate had done. They were carrying out what the Senate had indicated to be its own wish, that all these officers should receive the compensation. It was in defiance of the President, but not in defiance of what the Senate had agreed to. The President having refused to sign the joint resolution which had been agreed to by the Senate and House of Representatives, the House then determined to use their contingent fund for this purpose, and the Senate did not. That is the state of the case as I understand it, and being so, there is no violation of any understanding between the House and Senate. It is a mere question of whether the President should control.

Mr. TOOMBS. If it was not in violation of the understanding, I ask whether it was not in violation of the law—the joint resolution of 1854? I understand—and I wish the Senator would answer me—both Houses said they would not make this allowance without authority of law, or a joint resolution signed by the President. We passed one, it seems, and the House put an amendment to it, and the President refused to sign it; therefore it was not a law, but this was done in violation of law, and the House said they would do it out of the contingent fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course, the whole debate has gone on the assumption that it was a violation of law. That is the very reason of the difficulty in which we find ourselves placed. The law existed. The House and Senate passed a joint resolution, and if the President had signed it, the law would have been repealed; but he did not sign it, and therefore it stood; but it was not known to the House, or understood by the House, that the reason the President would not sign it was, that it would be in violation of law, for he would not give so foolish a reason as that, because the moment he signed it that became the law, and the old law ceased to exist. But he chose to say that either House should not pay the extra compensation to its employes—a very great impertinence on his part, in my opinion. They have a right to make extra compensation; that is to say, it is one of those cases where, I think, the President ought to leave it to the discretion of the Senate and House to do as they please, unless they propose to do something very unreasonable. It was in violation of law undoubtedly for the House of Representatives to do afterwards what they did. The ground on which it has been placed was, that the House did that on the presumption on which they had before acted, and the Senate had acted, in paying the usual compensation at every session of Congress.

Now, sir, one word more, for I do not propose to express an opinion or a wish, for I have none; or to argue the matter, but merely to state a fact. Some statement was made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] yesterday, intimating that the Clerk of the House had not paid this money, and somebody had said he would pay the whole for a certain small sum of money. I have been requested by Mr. Cullom to say that all these statements are utterly without foundation; that he actually paid without recourse to anybody, without bargain or understanding of any description or kind, all the money for which he has exhibited vouchers, and more, amounting to some fifteen or seventeen thousand dollars. He has paid it out; it has gone beyond his legal control. Some of it may be paid back again if this section does not pass; but a large part of it cannot be, for some of the parties are unable to pay, and some say they will not pay anyhow. He states that on his own responsibility, and requests me to say that any statements made contravening that, to any extent, are founded entirely in error, and contrary to the facts.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I said a few words when this question was up before us in Committee of the Whole; and I am induced now to add something to what I then said, on account of what I consider the very extraordinary position assumed by the Senator from Maine. The position assumed by the Senator from Maine is, that in his judgment it was a piece of impertinence in the President of the United States to decline signing a joint resolution—a joint resolution which I suppose he must have refused to sign because he deemed the policy of the resolution one adverse to the true interests of the Government, and the honest employment of the public funds in the compensation of the officers of the Government. There could have been no mistake, there could have been no misapprehension, as to the deliberate violation of the law; because, when the Senate desired to make this extra allowance, in obedience to law, it put it in the shape of a joint resolution, in which way alone could this allowance be made after the law had been passed as it then stood on the statute-book. The House passed the joint resolution with us. Why did it pass, afterwards, the resolution to pay out of the contingent fund? The Constitution says—

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask the Senator, "Does he know that they did pass it afterwards?"

Mr. BENJAMIN. I take that for granted. How could they pass it before?

Mr. STUART. I think it will be found that they did pass it before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am instructed to say it was passed afterwards. Whether it is so or not, I do not know; but that is the intimation I have received.

Mr. BENJAMIN. After the President of the United States refused to sign this joint resolution, there was but one mode of giving it effect, and that was to repass it by the concurrent votes of two thirds of each House; but the House of Representatives thought proper to declare, in effect, that it would not act in obedience to the law.

I pass that consideration aside, however, for the purpose of attacking the main point on which this appropriation is now defended. The appropriation is defended on this ground—and there was something plausible in it, when first put, which recommended itself to my ideas of the equity of the case; but all that has been dispelled by the debate: it was said this House officer, in obedience to the orders of the House of Representatives, has made disbursements; and it is unjust and improper that he should lose the sum so disbursed, in consequence of his obedience to the orders of the House, of which he was an officer. Now, sir, in reference to the resolutions of the last two Congresses, we find this to be the case: the public officer whose conduct is now questioned, and for whose relief this appropriation is now sought, is Mr. Cullom. He was the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the last Congress, both sessions. In 1856, the House of Representatives passed a resolution similar to that which it passed in 1857. Mr. Cullom made his disbursements; and what occurred? He was not allowed a reimbursement of the expenses so made, in consequence of objections at the Treasury Department; and the result was that, in the appropriation act of the 3d of March last, he was notified not to make any more such disbursements. He paid out in 1856 under the House resolution. In 1857 this law was passed:

"The extra compensation given by each of the two Houses of Congress in the year 1856, to its officers and employes, shall be paid by its disbursing officer out of the contingent fund."

That was a law passed by both Houses.

"And the accounts therefor shall be allowed by the accounting officer of the Treasury. But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to repeal the joint resolution of the 20th of July, 1854, to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such officers as received the benefits thereof; which said resolution is hereby declared to be in full force and effect, except so far as herein provided for."

The Clerk having met with this difficulty in the year 1856, the difficulty is obviated by legislation in March, 1857; and he is notified in the legislation which relieves him, that it is the last time it shall be done. He is notified that this is the last time he will be relieved. The House again passed the same resolution, and he comes here again and tells us that he has paid out money, and asks us to relieve him again.

That is the state of the case now before the Senate, and he comes here upon statements and suggestions that he paid out the money in good faith; and the appropriation asked for, as I understand, amounts to nearly seventy thousand dollars, upon the suggestion that he has paid fifteen, or sixteen, or seventeen thousand dollars.

Now, I am not disposed to be particularly captious about the reimbursement of this or any sum that he may actually have paid; but I desire an investigation into that fact. It has been suggested, on all sides, that the payments were not actually made, and we are not in the habit of making appropriations in answer to suggestions of that kind, upon the simple statement of the officer requesting a Senator to say that it is not true, and that he has paid. This, in point of fact, is neither more nor less than a section for the relief of Mr. Cullom. It is a private bill. Let it be stricken from this deficiency bill. Let Mr. Cullom present his petition to Congress, set forth the facts, state his payments, establish them, and I will vote for his relief. But let us not again sanction this breach of the law, this violation of the positive statutory provision, and again repeat, as the Senator from Illinois said the other day, like the boy at school, "Knock the chip off my head;""now you have done it, do it again, and do it again." We have passed this resolution eight, nine, or ten successive times. Here is an admitted abuse in the Government, admitted by the House, admitted by the Senate, shown to be so by the President's refusing to sign the joint resolution. Let us stop here. Let us not give the money, and the abuse will not take place again.

Mr. TOOMBS. I deem it proper to add a few remarks to what has been said, more in reference to my own course. It seems perfectly clear that this appropriation of money was made by the House of Representatives against the law. It ought not to have been paid, and it ought not to be reimbursed. It is time that we should have the laws of this country enforced. It is time that the public purse should be put under the control of Congress; but it seems that as far as this body and the other House are concerned, they are as imbecile as children or idiots. Their very employes make them violate the law whenever they please, and they have done it for ten years together. I recollect, in 1854, when the joint resolution was introduced changing the compensation of the employes and adding twenty per cent. to their salaries. We added twenty per cent. to the salaries of a body of employes who are paid higher than any in this Union, as far as I am informed, for the amount of labor they do. It was done with the express declaration that the twenty per cent. was in lieu of all extra compensation. It was so expressed on the face of the law. It was declared that that was to be the end of such things: they were not to be done after that. If you look to the debates you will find that I said I did not believe a word of it. Therefore I have not been deceived. Though they said so in their places, and said so in their law, I knew from the past history of the Senate and House of Representatives that it would not be carried out. It has been growing worse and worse every day: profligacy is becoming more and more universal in every department of the Government. There is a wild and reckless waste originating here, and imitated in every department of the Government. I had no hopes that it would stop. What is the result? In defiance of this law, the House of Representatives passed a resolution allowing this extra compensation, and I think the Senator from Maine is mistaken as to the time when it was passed. It was passed before the joint resolution to which he alluded. It was found out, however, that that would meet with difficulty; and then a joint resolution was offered, and at first it was rejected in this body, but finally it was passed, the Senate putting in their employes. The President declined to sign it. He was guilty of that "impertinence," it being his duty under the Constitution to sign what he approved, and to refuse his signature to what he disapproved. The compensation of these officers being already greater than any other in the whole Government, it having been raised two years before with the explicit understanding put on the statute-book that the twenty per cent. increase should be in lieu of all extra allowances, the President was guilty of the "impertinence" of telling a profligate Senate and a profligate House of Representatives that they should not do it. I honor him for it; and the people in any district of the United States would honor him for it.

Sir, there is irresponsibility here. These are small things; but there is no responsibility in the Senate for small or large appropriations on account of the character of the question which has distracted Congress the last two years,—I may say the last ten; there is none anywhere. All this waste of public money; all this disregard of public principle is swallowed up in the sectional strifes that have agitated this country, and therefore there is no real responsibility in the ordinary legislation of the Republic. This is a fact well known to every Senator here and to the nation. There is no responsibility for these votes and hence the country is so universally badly governed.

I see a notice, too, probably from your official organ, one who attempts to lecture you whenever it suits him, and who, I believe, gets whatever compensation he chooses to ask, the Public Printer of this body, upon a remark which I made yesterday with reference to your reporters. Sir, by your contract, it is the business of your Public Printer to furnish these debates and print them. He is paid for it, paid extravagantly for it in my judgment, and I have taken some pains to look into it—paid largely for it. It is his business to pay the reporters. You might as well undertake to pay the printers in his office. You might as well go and pay his paper-man, his press-man, or the interest upon his types, as to come here and pay his reporters. You first agreed to take twelve of these worthless books, these Congressional Globes; then I believe you carried it up to more than ninety copies, because he told you that he could not get along without it. Now he says there is a loss, and he leaves it to his own posterity, hoping that they may be able to wrench out of you whatever they want and as often as they want it, as he has done. That is about the pretext he gives. I say it is his business to pay these reporters, and while I believe the reporters have done their own duty it is not for me to pay them. Indeed, as far as I am concerned I would not have one in this House. No Senator ought to be speaking here for the country. The galleries are open to everybody. Your proceedings are open as they ought to be, as judicial proceedings are, though they were not for many years after this Government commenced. If a Senator wants to address the country let him do it directly, by an address to his constituents. That has been my own habit since I have been connected with public affairs. I have a rule which I made and have never departed from, to speak to the question before the body and to nothing else—to my fellow-Senators or fellow-members whom I may address. If I desire to address my constituents or the country, there are other vehicles more appropriate than the Senate. So far as these reports are concerned they are nuisances, for one very good reason: as a general rule, a speech that is fit to be spoken is not fit to be printed, and a speech fit to be printed is not fit to be spoken. It is merely for printing essays. One half of this very reporting for which you pay $7 50 a column to the editor of the Globe consists of written essays read here. The Senator from New York will come in with his already in type; other gentlemen all around me, on both sides of the House, from all sections of the Union, who think proper to write essays, come here and read them to the Senate and inflict on the country many of the speeches which we have. I am not objecting to their character, but I would rather read them in my own room. Of course nobody pays any attention to them here. It is not done anywhere else. These written speeches are not attended to. They are read and handed to the reporter, and he gets so much a column for printing them. It has been so with half the speeches delivered in this body the last two years, and it is a growing habit I believe. Two thirds of the speeches are written, and many of them are printed before they are ever delivered, or in type ready to be thrown out on the country the moment the speaker takes his seat. Therefore, sir, as to this stamped they speak of the reporters, I would, out of my poor means, be perfectly willing to make a very reasonable allowance to get rid of the whole of them.

Mr. PUGH. I would ask the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his amendment, for the purpose of letting me move an amendment to the entire section which, I think, will effect a reform. I move to strike out the entire section, and insert:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been made under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress, and to charge the amount of every such payment to any clerk, or other employe, who has received an allowance in addition to his salary prescribed by law, and deduct the amount of such payment from whatever may be due to such clerk, or other employe, from the Government of the United States whether as compensation or otherwise.

I am willing to indemnify the Clerk; but if we can reach this abuse, I think we ought to stop it. It is money that has gone out of the Treasury contrary to law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make one explanation. The Senator from Georgia stated that he knew the President refused to sign that joint resolution.

Mr. TOOMBS. I heard him say so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am informed by two gentlemen who were present, our own clerks, at the time that he first objected that the time was too late, and, on looking at his watch, he found there were a few minutes left. He then took the resolution, looked it over, and found an interlineation put into it which, apparently, did not make sense. He hesitated, and said, "I cannot sign it at this hour."

Mr. TOOMBS. I urged him not to sign it, and he said he would not. That I know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have stated the reason given to the two gentlemen to whom I have alluded. That was after the Senator from Georgia saw him, probably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that his amendment is not in order at present.

Mr. PUGH. I will state in explanation, that the original section as it stands proposes to indemnify the Clerk not merely for what he has paid, but for payments hereafter to be made. I wish to stop that. I want to indemnify him for no payment he has not yet made; but whatever he has paid in good faith, in obedience to the order of the House, I am willing to reimburse; but if the persons who receive it are in the employment of the House or Senate or the Government, they have received money illegally, and I think it ought to be taken out of their salaries. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. KING. I think this bill a very good occasion to make an example like that which the Senator from Georgia urges us to make in this section. Here is a bill appropriating over nine million dollars, much of it contracted by the executive department of the Government, without authority of law, and in advance of appropriations. Such a practice as this ought not to be allowed, and while I think Senators who make so much claim to economy in assailing this small appropriation of some eighteen or twenty thousand dollars are right in resisting it, they are wrong in going for these wholesale appropriations of money asked for from the Treasury for expenditures, without authority of law. I shall vote against the entire bill, and I will vote against any part of it.

I am glad to hear what is said on this matter; but I think there is great inconsistency in those who set up a claim to economy for resisting the small appropriation, while they go for the large ones. They are right in the small ones. We should never make an appropriation which is wrong, no matter how large or how small it is. The great difficulty in accomplishing economical reforms is that there are always, in reference to every appropriation, those who petition that the particular appropriation may be allowed, and the difficulty is in finding the place to begin the reform.

I differ entirely with the Senator from Georgia about the reports of our proceedings. I think the reporting system which has been adopted by Congress the best in the world. In a Government like ours it is one which is demanded for the use of the country. Very few people can come here and listen to the debates. Very few people here, unless there were accurate reports made by competent reporters, would know what is done in Congress. It is by printing the debates that the great body of the people of this country learn the transactions of their representatives here, and know what is going on in Congress. These reports should be accurate. For this purpose we should have the best reporters that can be had. I have been gratified to see, at this session of Congress, a notice given by the printer who has charge of these reports, that the proceedings of the two Houses would be published as they transpired; that what was said should be published in the Globe.

Mr. HALE. He has not done it.

Mr. KING. If he has not done it, he has committed an error. He was given these notices on two occasions during this session. I received them, and I think he was right. The public should know what actually occurs. But this is a matter foreign to the question of economy, foreign to the propriety of resisting the passage of this bill. I am glad to find a disposition to condemn these extravagant expenditures. I am opposed to them, and will vote against the entire bill. I think the reason which is urged against the appropriation of this amount for the payment of the clerks of the House exists against the whole bill about the ratio of the amount of $9,000,000, or pretty much the whole bill, to the $20,000 in the section under consideration.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me that the Senator from New York misapprehends the merits of the question; but I would not delay the Senate a single day's session to debate the amount of these allowances. Here is an abuse, a violation of law, persisted in from session to session, and from year to year, so that we do not stand before the country in the proper attitude to redress any violation of law committed by the Executive Departments. With what face could we say to the Secretary of War, or any other executive officer, you have made contracts in violation of law, or you have paid out money in violation of law, when we repeatedly, year after year, session after session, prohibit these allowances in joint resolutions, in bills, in laws, and then turn around, on the last night of the session, and engage in this thing which we have solemnly said we would not engage in? We have not even the self-respect to keep our own words as written in the statute-book.

These gentlemen have had their pay raised. If it is not enough I am willing to raise it again; but I want it done by law. I wish to put an end to all these systems by which Congress is surrounded at the close of the session, and these resolutions put through to pay out public money under the pretense of increasing the contingent fund of the two Houses. It is not the amount of the money that impresses my mind; it is the persistence in an abuse until, as I said yesterday, we let them know that the sting of disability is in the very fruit of temptation—that they cannot get this money; that, if any accounting officer pays it, he will not be allowed to get it back. When the accounting officers of the two Houses understand that, there will be an end of these resolutions.

Now, I am willing to take the case of this Clerk of the House of Representatives into very tender consideration. I shall not hold him to a strict rule, because it was only by a struggle of two years that we were able to put a stop to the book business, and we had to indemnify him for that. I am willing to indemnify him for what he has paid; and so far as my vote goes, I wish it distinctly understood that I will vote to indemnify no officer of either House of Congress, after this time, who pays any money under such resolutions as these in violation of the act of Congress.

Mr. JONES. I believe I will offer an amendment to the amendment if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Mason.) It is not in order. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will wait until this is disposed of.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the vote is taken, I desire to know whether the adoption of this section will prevent us hereafter from making any allowance to the employes of this House, and from paying the reporters? I desire, if the section passes, to put the employes of this House on the same footing as those of the other House. While I believe this system of extra compensation has probably gone too far, I am desirous, if it does end, that the persons employed in each House shall be exactly on the same footing. The section has been amended so often that I really have not been able to understand its true import. I doubt whether many gentlemen here do understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BIGGS.]

The question being taken, on a division, there were—ayes 17, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. BENJAMIN and Mr. BIGGS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. As the yeas and nays are ordered, I wish to say in a single word, that while I am perfectly willing to vote to strike out this section, I cannot vote for this amendment, because the amendment nullifies the section. First, you tell the Clerk to pay the money, then you tell him he must not pay in contravention of a particular resolution. If he cannot do it in contravention of that resolution, he cannot do it at all.

Mr. BIGGS. I think the Senator from Mississippi is mistaken in regard to the effect of this amendment. It cuts off from this allowance all those who received additional compensation under the act of 1854. There are two sets of employes provided for by this allowance. This amendment cuts off all those who had their compensation increased in 1854, on the condition that they should not have any extra compensation.

Mr. BELL. I will not repeat the sentiments I expressed the other day in relation to the general question raised under the section proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Finance; but, as I understand the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, it does not recognize the right of the late Clerk of the House of Representatives to be refunded what he has actually paid. Now, I think that is unjust, considering all the circumstances attending the history of this transaction. I spoke to the honorable Senator, and suggested that I thought that was wrong. He says that if the Clerk can show that he is entitled to it, it is a subject of private claim by a private bill. I think that is harsh, and under the circumstances of the case, unjust; and, therefore, I shall be compelled to vote against this amendment.

I wish to do nothing more than what is right. If our own hands were clean in reference to the practice of voting appropriations and extra allowances contrary to a plain statute adopted by a joint resolution of the two Houses, it would be a different question with us; but as the case now stands, I think we hardly have any right to interfere. We have the power, if we think proper, but I do not believe it is very becoming to adopt a rigid rule as to what we will appropriate or withhold, upon the reasons which have been urged here by honorable Senators. When the question comes up in some other form, and a proposition is made in relation to the reporters, I may have something to say on that subject. I wish now merely to state the grounds on which I cannot vote for this amendment, although I see it has considerable favor in the Senate.

The late Clerk of the House of Representatives, in conformity with the practice of both branches of Congress, has paid this money. He saw that the Senate had yielded to it as well as the House of Representatives; and if the House can be justly denounced as a profligate body, the Senate may also be denounced as a profligate body. Indeed, the honorable Senator from Georgia has said they both are, in reference to such questions. Now, when the Clerk of the House, seeing the practice of the Senate, as well as of the House, in disregarding plain statutes, which both Houses had concurred in, adopting over and over again, continuing to make these extra allowances, has gone on and paid fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars under the order of the House of which he is an officer, he ought to be refunded in fairness.

I find, also, that the Secretary of the Treasury takes no exception to the equity and justice of paying what has been expended by the Clerk of the House. His only exception is, that he could not advise the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay it without the authority of Congress, and he earnestly recommends to Congress to pass an act for that purpose. If it be the fact that he has not paid any money, we ought to make no appropriation for him, but pursue a course legitimately in conformity with the act of 1854. Honorable Senators here say he has not paid it. The Secretary of the Treasury does not make any question on that point. The officers of the Treasury raise no objection on that point; they simply stand upon the law prohibiting such appropriations out of the contingent fund of either House of Congress.

I do not want to detain the Senate any longer; I merely rose for the purpose of stating the grounds on which I cannot vote for this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Clay, Dixon, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, Wright, and Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Gwin, Houston, Kennedy, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Will it be in order for me now to move my amendment? I have been requested to do it, and I do it in compliance with a promise. It is in section three, line eight, after the word "accounts," to insert:

"And that there be paid, by the Secretary of the Senate, to the employes of the Senate who did not receive the same at the last session, the amounts respectively that were allowed to the employes of the House by the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 2, 1857."

Mr. HUNTER. That is not in order. It comes from no committee, as I understand. It is an additional appropriation.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Chair whether it is in order, or not? If it is not, I do not wish to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware of any rule that restricts it.

Mr. HUNTER. No amendment for an additional appropriation is in order unless recommended by some committee or estimated for by some Department. This is an additional appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought that rule was confined to private claims.

Mr. HUNTER. This is an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 30th rule, in the opinion of the Chair, would exclude it. The Chair decides the amendment is not in order under the 30th rule.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to move an amendment to strike out the words "or may be," in the fourth line of the third section. The clause would then read:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been made under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress.

The ground upon which I would place my vote is simply this: that when the Clerk of the House of Representatives has actually paid out the money under the direction of the House, we ought to refund to him the money which he has actually paid. I think that is but just. I inquire of the Chair whether it would be proper, in connection with that amendment moving to strike out these words, also to strike out the words which have been inserted on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that would not be in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My suggestion is, that inasmuch as the change which I propose in the first part of the section changes the meaning of the whole section, and also of necessity changes the meaning of the amendment which has been adopted, I submit whether it would not be in order for me to embrace both within my amendment and take the sense of the Senate upon that simple question as it stands? I desire to see whether we shall authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the money which has been actually paid under the express direction of the House of Representatives by the Clerk. I desire to have the sense of the Senate tested on that precise question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can submit his amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that as the section stands now amended, that would not cover any one payment that has been made by the Clerk at all. It does not repay him at all, so that the only object and effect would be to prevent his making any payments hereafter. Everything he has paid has been struck out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I move to strike out the third section as amended, and to substitute the old third section as it reads with the words "or may be" stricken out. The words to be inserted are:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been made under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress: Provided, That said allowances shall have been duly approved by the Committee on Accounts: And be it further provided, That the said allowances be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote against this amendment, and against the whole section, if it is to be amended in this way. I think the whole proceedings of the Senate in regard to this matter unfair and unjust. I feel disposed to vote to strike out unconditionally the whole section, and let it go back to the House to be dealt with in that form. If it was right for the Clerk to pay out the money to any of these employes, it is right that all of them should be treated fairly and equally. Now, this amendment proposes to refund to the Clerk the moneys he has paid under the resolution of the House of Representatives; that is, the persons whom the Clerk has paid have their extra pay; the others are to go without it.

I think this is unfair and unjust. I think the Clerk ought to be refunded the money he has paid out. In my opinion, the resolution of the House paying the employes ought to be carried out; and I understand the Secretary of the Treasury thinks so, and wishes it done. I am opposed to this extra-pay policy; but it has been pursued for years in both Houses of Congress. Why is it that the employes of the last House are particularly aimed at and struck at in this matter? I look upon it merely in that light. I am ready to carry out this vote in regard to the last Congress, and have it understood now and forever, so far as we here are concerned, that we vote no more extra pay. Let us settle it for the last Congress. The order of the House directing their Clerk to pay this money has been partially carried out; and I think it should be fully carried out, or not carried out at all. I hope this amendment will not prevail. I hope this section, as amended, will be stricken out; for, as amended on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, it covers hardly a case intended by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, will prevail. I shall cheerfully give it my vote. I condemn, as emphatically as any Senator can, this policy of extra pay. I think it is wrong; and for that reason I will not vote to extend this wrong at the present time. But here the Senate and the House, by a joint resolution, voted the extra pay to their employes; the President refused to sign that joint resolution. It came back, and the House then, by a resolution, ordered its Clerk to pay this money to the employes of the House. Now let gentlemen see where they put the Clerk of the House. Here was the House ordering him to pay; here were the employes of the House requesting their payment. He has got to take the responsibility of refusing to pay against the resolution of the House, or else, if this amendment be not adopted, he has got to lose the money that he has paid out.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What prevented the Clerk from applying for the money to the Secretary of the Treasury before he paid it? Why did he advance it out of his own pocket?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot say why he did it; I do not know why he did it; I do not understand in regard to that; but the money, as I understand, has been paid by the Clerk for some reason or other, and I would have him repaid. I understood the Senator from Louisiana, a little while ago, to say, that if the Clerk made a fair showing that he had paid the money, he would give his vote for reimbursement. I understand him to assent to that now. Then if this amendment is adopted, and the Clerk does show that he has paid the money out, he can only get by this amendment what he has paid out, and that would be accomplishing by this bill exactly what the Senator would be willing to do by another bill or resolution. Then I might ask the honorable Senator why he would not vote for it now?

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will tell him at once? When the application is made for the reimbursement of this Clerk, I want something more than vouchers. I want this question of his payment of the money submitted to a committee of Congress, and I want to examine the parties to whom he says he has paid it, and take evidence and cross-examine them. I understand this whole thing is a covered-up snare and delusion.

Mr. CLARK. It may be a covered-up snare and delusion, for aught that I know; but this amendment provides only that the Clerk shall be refunded the money which he has paid, not the money which he has covered up. I do not see why you cannot as well show under this amendment what is paid, as you can show it anywhere else; and I want to get so much. I do not propose to have this Clerk turned over, if I can prevent it by my vote, to another bill. Let him be paid by this bill, and let him be paid what he has paid out under the order of the House. I shall give my vote for this amendment; and then, as indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts, if the amendment does not prevail, I will vote to strike out the whole section and let it go back to the House again, and let them come in with a clean bill, and let the whole thing be considered. I would be glad to secure so much here. The Clerk has paid out money under the order of the House. I think no one here will say that he ought to lose what he has paid out. He should be repaid. Then you gain so much by adopting this amendment: you provide that he shall be repaid what he has paid. I therefore shall go for this amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin; but if it is not adopted, I shall go for striking out the whole section, so that in some other way the Clerk may be repaid.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will merely suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the way in which this matter is settled at the Treasury is perfectly understood here in Washington. If this is left to the Secretary of the Treasury, this Clerk carries him receipts; they are vouchers which are admitted; he gets the money under these receipts; he then takes it and pays it to the parties who have given these receipts; if he does not get it, he returns the receipts. I want this matter investigated by a committee to see if the money has been paid.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand, this amendment proposes only to pay what he has paid; not where he has carried a receipt and has not paid money, but what has been paid.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot investigate that question. When vouchers are brought to him—the receipts for payment—he takes them as proof of payment; and he is thus defrauded in a matter which he has no power to investigate. The receipts are vouchers; but a committee of the Senate can bring the parties before it, put them on oath, and ascertain whether the money was really paid, or whether these are vouchers furnished for the purpose of getting the money.

Mr. CLARK. I understand the position of the Senator from Louisiana; but I do not understand that this amendment provides how the Clerk shall show that he has paid it. It does not provide that he shall simply exhibit his receipts and be paid. He is only to be repaid the money that he has paid out. The officers of the Treasury may take such method as they choose for ascertaining that fact. I want to gain one step in regard to it here; I do not see why, if we should refuse to pay it here, we are to pay it afterwards; I do not understand any Senator to be against refunding to the Clerk what he has already paid. As I said before, he paid it under the order of the House. He stood in a peculiar position—the House commanding him to pay, and it would be hardly courteous in him to the House to get up and say: "I will not pay that money; you are acting in defiance of law." The House would have said: "It is not for you to judge, sir; pay the money under the resolution of the House." It was a delicate position in which to place the Clerk.

I admit, freely, that I have been embarrassed in regard to this vote. It is a delicate question; it is difficult to decide what to do. It is difficult to know how you are going to stop this improper sort of allowance, if you may call it so. The injustice would be very great in refusing to repay to the Clerk money paid out in good faith. We are to take it that he did pay it in good faith, until the contrary is shown. You are not to presume fraud on his part. I do not know how things are done in Washington; but before I will refuse to pay that money to the Clerk, as the case stands now, you must show that he acted fraudulently; you are not to presume it; and when you can show me that he has done it, then that will be a reason why he should not be repaid at all, why he should not have an additional bill. As the case stands now, however, it seems to me he should be repaid, and there is no reason why he should not be. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BIGGS. This may be a test question, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. At the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] I am willing to add to the section the clause which was added by the committee in reference to future allowances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can only be done by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the proposition.

Mr. PUGH. I presume there will be no objection to the Senator perfecting his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be modified as proposed. The Chair hears no objection.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Gwin, Houston, Kennedy, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hale, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—22.

So the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I have now modified the amendment which I offered, so as to make it conform to your decision, sir, and make it in order. I believe it was in order before. I did not hear the decision of the Chair, however. The amendment is, in section three, line eight, after the word "accounts," to insert:

And that there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, by the Secretary of the Senate, to the employees of the Senate who did not receive the same at the last session, the amounts respectively that were allowed to the employees of the House by the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 2, 1857.

I merely wish to remark that I voted for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, but I am desirous of placing our employees on an equal footing with those of the House of Representatives. If they are paid, I want ours to be.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask to have that amendment read again. I think it is not in order unless it comes from a committee.

Mr. JONES. It is perfectly in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to amend the amendment before the Senator from Virginia raises his question. I shall vote against it in any shape in which it may be put, but it ought to be made general, and include the employees in charge of the library, because they are here, and they ought to come in with the others. They are not legislative clerks, but still they are usually embraced in these resolutions; and, if the others are paid, I do not see any reason why they should not be.

Mr. JONES. I accept the modification.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Before the Senator from Virginia raises his point of order, I would suggest to my friend from Iowa to make his amendment perfect by including the employees of the executive department, and of the judicial department of the Government throughout the United States, so as to make it regular everywhere.

Mr. JONES. I cannot stand that, sir; it is a little too strong.

Mr. HUNTER. This is an addition to the appropriations made in the bill. I raise a question of order whether, without a report from a committee, such an amendment can be offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands from the Senator from Iowa that he considers this to be within the rule because, as he reasons, it is money to be paid out of the contingent fund which is already appropriated.

Mr. JONES. That is exactly the idea.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will therefore submit the question of the admission of this amendment to the Senate, without deciding it.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Chair submits it to the Senate to say whether the amendment is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit it to the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I would say to the Senate that they ought to be cautious in ruling such a thing as this to be in order, because it undoubtedly is an addition to the appropriation, and we are permitting the House to pass upon the mode in which we shall appropriate our own contingent fund. We may do that in a separate resolution; we may do that without an appropriation bill; but we cannot add that to an appropriation bill without violating the rule referred to. That is a matter which belongs to the Senate, and we are not to invoke the House to say whether we shall appropriate our contingent fund.

Mr. STUART. That may be a reason against adopting the amendment, but the rule certainly prohibits only such amendments as involve no appropriations. It will be seen at a glance what is the reason for asking that there be an estimate from the head of a Department or a recommendation from a standing committee of the Senate, in order to make an amendment in order. That shows that it is one involving a new appropriation. No amendment that does not involve a new appropriation is out of order under that rule; and it is the every-day practice here to allow an amendment coming from a committee to be amended on the motion of a single member, though the amendment to the amendment may in itself increase or diminish the amount of money appropriated. Inasmuch as this amendment provides for its payment out of the contingent fund of the Senate, it is clear that it does not involve any additional appropriation. The rule only cuts off additional appropriations. As I said, the argument of the Senator from Virginia may be a good one to induce the Senate to vote against the amendment; but as a question of order it certainly has no application.

Mr. COLLAMER. After the place where the present amendment is proposed to be inserted, the section provides that the amount shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. It has a general provision of that kind. The money would have to be paid, even if it should come out of our contingent fund; and therefore it is really an additional appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question whether the amendment of Mr. JONES should be received as in order, and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not received.

Mr. WILSON. Would it be in order now to insert the words "and may be" after the words "have been," and before the word "paid?" The motion I make is, to insert the words "or may be" after the word "been" in the fourth line of the third section.

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand it, those words have already been stricken out by an amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. If so, we cannot have another vote on it without reconsideration. We cannot move to insert that which has been stricken out by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the whole section is stricken out. This is now proposed as an amendment to the amendment modified as presented.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it an amendment to an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole section was stricken out, and a new one introduced in place of it. It is proposed now to modify that new section.

Mr. HUNTER. But you cannot modify that new section because it has been adopted. The amendment to the section has been adopted. The Senate has passed upon it. It has determined to adopt that. You cannot amend what the Senate has determined to adopt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair misunderstood it. He does not consider the amendment in order, because the section in its present form has just been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Chair rule my motion out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is, as the amendment has just been voted in.

Mr. WILSON. Would it be in order to reconsider those words?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order to reconsider the late vote of the Senate by which that whole section was adopted in its present form.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the whole section, and I want to state very briefly why I do it. I think the adoption of that section, as now amended, unfair and unjust. It proposes to pay the Clerk of the House the money he paid out under the direction of the House to some persons employed by the House, and all other persons who have not been paid are to receive nothing. Now, sir, I believe it impartial and unjust; and we had better strike the whole of it out and let it go. I have no doubt that, in some form, the money will be restored to him this session; but I think we had better strike out this section, and, as the bill goes back to the House, we are more likely to secure justice and equity to the employes of that House. I therefore shall vote to strike it out.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I cannot suffer to pass unchallenged this new code of political ethics. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is this: if certain parties have, in violation of law, got money out of the Treasury, it is quite unfair and unjust that we shall not let other parties get some too. The proposition as first made was, that we should restore to the Clerk of the House that which he had paid out in obedience to the order of the House, although admitted to be in violation of law; but it was upon the ground that he had been placed in a delicate position, and had been compelled to yield obedience to the order of his own House. But the Senator from Massachusetts says that is not fair; that some of these men have got money in violation of law, and that there is no justice unless we pass a resolution allowing other men to get money in violation of law; that the plunder ought to be general; that as we have allowed it to be partial, there is nothing but justice in allowing it to be made general. I hope if it is to be made general, that members of both Houses, and everybody else, will be allowed a share. Let us have this justice in plundering the public Treasury universally, and let us allow this sum to every man in the United States. Then there will be justice, then there will be equality; but this political morality which requires you to allow one man to steal because another has stolen, is something novel in Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not understand that there is any amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not consider that the motion to strike out is in order, because the matter proposed to be stricken out has just been inserted by a vote of the Senate. It would be in order to move to reconsider.

Mr. WILSON. Before I make that motion, I wish to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Louisiana. I desire to say, in the first place, that I receive his lecture in all kindness. Let me tell him, what he knows to be true, that the employes in both Houses of Congress, for years, have had voted to them extra pay; and that Senator, within a year or two, has helped to do it. Now he calls it plunder. Was it plunder when the Senator from Louisiana voted for extra pay to the Chaplain of the Senate at the last Congress? When that holy man of God put his hands into the Treasury, and took that extra pay, did he plunder? The Senator from Louisiana, and other Senators here, voted for it. Sir, it is a fact known to the members of the Senate, that we have voted to the persons employed in the Senate and House extra pay for years. I do not justify the system.

All that I have to say about it is, that Congress has done it; all parties have been engaged in it. The last House of Representatives acted in this way. Their Clerk paid a portion of the persons employed the extra pay; others have not been paid.

Now, sir, what I want is fair play. Let this Congress pay what the last Congress ordered to be paid—pay all persons covered by the House resolution, and then let us start fair, with the understanding that we shall stop the whole system, and make no more of these allowances. Let the resolution, as passed, be carried out. It would have been carried out if it had not been for a new construction put upon an old law. I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks it right that it should be carried out. Why, sir, one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House from Virginia, a man who cares as much for the Treasury of the United States as any other man in Congress; a man who, in money matters, I believe, is one of the purest and most upright men in Congress—I mean Mr. LETCHER, of Virginia—advocated this as right and just, maintaining that it ought to be carried out, and that we ought to stop here.

But what do you propose? You propose to pay back to the Clerk what he has paid out. The persons to whom he has paid it get their extra pay—the other equally faithful persons employed by the House of Representatives receive nothing. Now, I would pay them all according to the resolution, and then I would stop and pass no more extra pay resolutions. But it is proposed to stop with the employes of the last House of Representatives, and that is the whole of it. I should like to have this struck out.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senator if we have not stopped on the employes of the Senate?

Mr. WILSON. We did not stop on the man who did the paying for us at the last Congress. We paid him then. I cannot say about all the other employes. I am against this whole bill. We are sucklers here on a little matter connected with a few employes of the House, while we vote readily for contracts made contrary to law by men who put their hands up to their elbows in the Treasury.

Sir, I believe I have as much interest and as much care in regard to the Treasury as other men; but I do not wish to be lectured here in regard to it. I have made this discovery, Mr. President, in my experience in Congress and in the country, that the members of a certain party—I mean the supporters of this Administration—canginto the Treasury, put their hands in, and their arms in, and cover themselves from head to heel with gold; while, if a bit of gold happens to touch the garments of persons of another party, they are ruined and damned. I believe candidly that the warfare on this proposition springs chiefly and mainly from the fact that the employes of the last House did not belong to the political party that now controls this country, or has the administration of the Government. I want to carry out the resolution of the House and stop here; and I never want to hear anything more about extra pay.

There is another point. I am told that the clerks of the committees of the House receive four dollars a day while our committee clerks receive six dollars. I do not know that their other employes are in the same ratio. If they be there may be some special reasons why the employes of the House of Representatives should receive extra pay. Of that I am not informed. We have struck out of this bill, however, their reporters; they have found it out and they have put their reporters in another bill, and they will come here again.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely wish to remark, in reply to the charge which has been made so often here, that this bill contains appropriations for contracts made contrary to law, that I am not aware of any such contracts for which this bill is providing. It is made to provide for contracts made without appropriations, but made under a law sanctioning them, specially the law of 1820.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will say one word more in relation to what the gentleman from Virginia has just suggested.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to know what the question is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has more than once reminded the Senate that there is no question now pending until another amendment is read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will let the vote be taken on this.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill, by striking out—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that there are amendments pending, reported from the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, not yet disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we pass to other amendments, I propose making a motion to reconsider a vote that has passed within a few moments, on which I voted with the majority. Prior to making the motion, I wish to say, in a very few words, that in regard to the position of this bill and some of the votes which have been taken, I have been perplexed and embarrassed how to vote. It was in many of the votes I have given, a troublesome question with me how to vote, for it was manifest we were in a difficulty to some extent, let us decide these questions as we might. I voted in view of the best lights that are before me, and I am not entirely sure that I have not voted right; but I have such doubts about it, that I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, on which I voted with him, and voted with the majority.

Mr. DURKEE and others. That is stricken out.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand not.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that that whole third section, after it had received that amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and a variety of others, was altogether stricken out, and a substitute put in its place, on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FOSTER. I voted for that, and was going to say that I meant, also, to move a reconsideration of that vote.

Mr. COLLAMER. That must be reconsidered first.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is any difference in point of priority, if one must be reconsidered before the other, I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. My object was to get directly at my purpose by moving to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; but, as suggested, I think it is more proper, in point of form, to reconsider the other first, and it may be necessary. I move, therefore, that we reconsider the vote on the amendment of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, stating my purpose to be, if that shall prevail and the vote shall be reconsidered and the amendment rejected, then to move to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HALE. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a decision which he has just made, which I think is a mistake. I do not want to take an appeal; but I think the Chair is evidently mistaken. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin was an amendment after the enacting clause of the section, and it was adopted. Then the Senator from Massachusetts moved to strike out the whole section, enacting clause and all. That is clearly in order, and the Chair is mistaken in its decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would say in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin was to strike out one clause, and to insert another in its place; and it would not be competent now to move to amend the inserted matter.

Mr. PUGH. I understood that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin was to strike out all after the enacting clause, but that it did not prevent my motion, of which I had given notice, to strike out the entire section. If it has any such effect I shall move to reconsider that vote; for I reserve yet the right to move to strike out the entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now moved by the Senator from Connecticut to reconsider the last vote of the Senate, by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin was adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish the remark made by the Senator from Virginia not to go unchallenged. I do not propose to go over the ground again; it has been so fully argued by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN], and I said something upon it yesterday. The Senator has remarked that he is not aware that this bill makes appropriations to pay money on contracts which were made without authority of law. I think it has been clearly shown that the contracts for which this bill provides were made contrary to law—not only that there was no appropriation to meet the contracts, but that the contracts were made without advertisements, in direct violation of law, as was shown by the Senator from Maine, by reference to the law, and as I tried to show yesterday. The foundation of the whole bill, so far as it relates to the appropriations for the Utah expedition, is an unwarranted assumption on the part of the President.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was about, a few moments ago, to say a few words on this very subject of contracts having been made in violation of law, because not advertised, and to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Maine to their mistake on that subject. There is a statute which both have overlooked, which expressly authorizes contracts without advertisements. I will read it. The act of the 14th of April, 1818, provides—

“That supplies for the Army, unless in particular and urgent cases the Secretary of War should otherwise direct, shall be purchased by contract to be made by the commissary general on public notice.”

By the act of the 23d of August, 1842, the office of the commissary general of purchase was abolished, and the powers and duties of that officer were devolved on the quartermaster's department. There is a special statute authorizing the Secretary of War, in cases of urgent necessity, to direct this purchase of supplies for the Army without advertisement; and that is what is asserted to have been done in contravention of law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I feel very unwilling to vote against this motion, as it is made by my friend from Connecticut; but it seems to me that we are getting more and more into trouble by reconsidering these votes. I have voted against altering this section as it came from the House, I believe in every instance, except the first amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. The whole difficulty is, that we are undertaking to interfere with the usual practice of the two Houses, to pay their clerks and other employes as they see fit. It ought never to be interfered with, in my deliberate judgment, unless there is some very extraordinary conduct on the part of one House. These joint resolutions and regulations about paying our pages and messengers and clerks, I have never known adhered to any longer than the close of the next session after they were made. We generally make these extra allowances, and then pass a law that we will never pay them again, and when we come to the end of the session we forget it. A sort of appeal is made to our generosity which I do not think deserves a great deal of harsh censure any way.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator will allow me to say, that by reconsidering the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and the Senator from North Carolina, we shall probably come to a result, at least so far as my vote is concerned, where we shall be in condition to follow out the doctrine suggested by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to get at it, but we have been at it two days, and we are getting further and further off.

Mr. FOSTER, and others. This will do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it will come to that result, I hope we shall get rid of this difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER. That was my object in making the motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE.

Mr. PUGH. Now is the amendment to strike out the entire section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert another provision.

Mr. PUGH. After that motion, I understand it will still be in order to move to strike out the whole section, including the enacting clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the new matter proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STUART. The question now before the Senate is the same one which we voted upon before, and I understood the Chair recently to state that that was a motion to strike out the section and insert a new one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the section.

Mr. STUART. Then I misapprehended the Chair.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I now move that the Senate reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment proposed this morning by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. That amendment was, in the third section, after the word “Congress,” in line six, to insert, “not in contravention of the joint resolution ‘to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits thereof,’” approved July 20, 1854.

Mr. BIGGS. I suppose it is as well to make a test question on the reconsideration as anything else. I therefore call for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider. It is the same question we have discussed here, and I do not propose to trouble the Senate again in regard to it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Before the question is taken I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina, and also especially of the Senator from Louisiana, to the fact that on the 5th of March, 1857, the Senate rearranged its committees on a report of the Senator from Louisiana, and without referring at all to this law of 1854, provided “the clerks employed by all the other committees shall receive a compensation of six dollars per diem during the time of their actual employment, and at the close of the second session of each Congress shall be entitled to an extra compensation equal to the amount of their per diem for sixty days.” Thus we have provided here in the Senate that our clerks shall have $360 extra compensation. The House of Representatives propose to give $240 to their clerks. That is the difference, and the Senator from Louisiana himself made the report providing for $360 extra to our clerks.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator will permit me a moment. He certainly does not understand the position of the Senate on this subject. By law each House has a right to employ such clerks and assistants as it pleases, and in employing them to fix the compensation; and the compensation so fixed at the date of employment is entirely within the discretion of the House. It is not touched at all by this resolution. The resolution attacks the abuse of paying men extra compensation, after their employment has been contracted upon a particular basis of compensation, by way of gratuity. Now you employ your Secretary. You pay him any salary that you please. You may to-day say that for the future he shall have ten thousand dollars a year instead of one thousand. You have a perfect right to do it. There is no law that prohibits it. If you say, however, that his compensation shall be five thousand dollars a year, and at the end of the term allow him one dollar more for what he has already done, you are allowing extra compensation.

Now, in arranging the committees, a scale of future payment for their clerks was established. They were to have six dollars per day for their service; but as in the short session they were employed only ninety days they were to have six dollars per day extra for sixty days beyond the session. That was one mode of providing for the way in which their service should be calculated in futuro. It was no grant, no gift, no gratuity for past service, but the basis upon which future services were to be compensated. That is the distinction. That is perfectly in accordance with law.

Mr. WILSON. A single word. I understand the explanation made by the Senator, but it amounts to this: our clerks are allowed six dollars per day, and then, by our own rules, six dollars for sixty days extra, which is $360. I think that right; I agree with the Senator. But the House of Representatives give their clerks of committees four dollars per day, and they have got no extra. They propose it in this bill, and you are going to strike out $240 granted to the clerks of the House, who have only four dollars a day, and you give $360 to your own clerks, who have six dollars per day.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Nobody denies the right of the House to employ their clerks at four dollars or ten dollars a day, or to give them fifty dollars a day after the end of the session, if they will put it in the rule at the beginning of the session, when they employ them. The objection is, that after employing men, and fixing the amount at which they should be employed, they make presents.

Mr. WILSON. Then we had better let them do this, and give them an opportunity to make their own laws about it in future. They voted it as a just compensation. I think we had better do it, and have this matter quietly settled.

Mr. FOSTER. When this amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina was before the Senate, I voted for it. I voted for it mainly because it would prevent the payment of a certain sum of money out of the Treasury which it was agreed was about to be paid under circumstances not strictly warranted by law. It seemed to me, in the condition of the country and of the Treasury, I was called upon to prevent any payment, even a small one, that I lawfully could.

A great deal is said here about economy; but though I take up less time perhaps than some gentlemen in speaking of it, I am disposed to vote, where economy is concerned, I trust, on the side of a judicious economy. Under the circumstances, if this vote is reconsidered, I shall change my vote on this amendment, and shall vote against it. I believe, under all the circumstances, it is judicious and best that the amendment shall not prevail; that the House of Representatives should be allowed, at least so far as we are concerned, to close this matter, and to end it, it being a matter of a former Congress; and then let us exert ourselves with all the energy that may be to use economy in our administration; and where our authority is concerned, let it be on the side of strict economy, and the maintenance of the law.

I regret, somewhat, to make this explanation, and to change my vote; but the question was so complex, so difficult, so full of difficulty now and promising so much more difficulty in the future, that it seems to me we consult a wise economy in passing this by. As regards the amount, it certainly is not a large one compared with the amounts which are going from the Treasury constantly, swelling up our expenditure annually to a sum that is absolutely startling. Why, sir, our expenses this year will unquestionably exceed seventy million dollars—an amount of more than three hundred thousand dollars for every congressional district in the United States. In the small State from which I come, having four congressional districts, if this amount were to be raised by a direct tax, the State of Connecticut would be compelled to pay for the support of the national Government twelve hundred thousand dollars a year. Possibly, sir, we are as able to pay that sum as any other of the States; possibly not. I am free to confess it would be with great difficulty that that sum of twelve hundred thousand dollars could be collected in the State of Connecticut, by a direct tax, for the support of this Government; but I feel pride in saying that I believe my State would pay, as cheerfully as any State in the Union, her just share of the expenses of the Government. I should feel somewhat startled, however, and my constituents would be startled, if they were called upon to pay, by direct taxation, twelve hundred thousand dollars a year for the support of this Government. You are taking such a course as compels our States to this; and under these circumstances, if we can stop these extravagant expenditures, and can bring the amount necessary for the support of this Government within any reasonable limits, it seems to me we need not argue to show the necessity of it.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to make one appeal to the Senator from Connecticut, who is desirous of reforming these abuses. If this vote is reconsidered, it allows all the officers in the House of Representatives compensation for the last session of Congress. We have not made such allowances in the Senate at all. Will there not be an appeal made to us, and have not appeals already been made, that if we make these allowances, in contravention of the act of 1854, to the House employes, we ought certainly to make them to our own employes? I desire here to state that that will be the consequence, it seems to me, of reconsidering this vote. We shall be called upon by the employes of the Senate to make the same compensation to them; whereas, if we adopt this amendment, we cut off that. Both Houses will stand fair then. The employes of both have been allowed their compensation for the first session of the last Congress. The employes of the House of Representatives have not been allowed extra pay for the last session except in this bill; we have made no such allowances to our employes; and thus both stand fair. Now, whatever may be the result of the present vote in regard to this matter, I here distinctly avow that under no circumstances will I vote to make these extra allowances to the employes of the Senate, whether this pass or not; but the appeal will be made, and a very strong appeal will be made to us: "As you have made an allowance for the employes of the House, you ought certainly to put the employes of the Senate on the same footing;" and that will be a consequence of reconsidering this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he does not think that the services of the clerk of a committee in the House is intrinsically worth as much as those of a clerk to a committee of the Senate? It is stated that the clerks in that body receive four dollars a day, and the clerks here six dollars. I was told, when I heard of this sum being allowed to clerks, that in former years we allowed clerks of committees in the Senate four dollars, and as it was usual to allow twenty per cent. extra, they concluded to put it in the price itself, and add twenty per cent. to the five dollars, making six dollars. I never did vote against these additions. I do not profess to have this notion of economy. But in addition to the six dollars, after one allowance has been made, the Senator from Louisiana has found out a way to give them pay for sixty days more, not as extra allowance, but to put it in before they are contracted with.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That was not passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether it was passed or not.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I proposed it. I think it was right; but it was not passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that if those who profess so much economy did not use extravagance, it was because they could not carry their propositions.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Every gentleman speaking on this subject displaces the argument. I did not say a word about economy. I spoke about the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I did not know but that the law was made for the purpose of economy; but if it had nothing to do with economy—

Mr. BENJAMIN. No, sir; it was to prevent plunder, to prevent abuse.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I objected to in the outset was, that we should interfere with the prices allowed by the House of Representatives to their employes. I will not consent that they shall interfere with ours. I never did agree to any proposition to allow the House of Representatives to control the contingent fund of the Senate, and I am equally unwilling to interpose any obstacle to their disposing of their contingent fund as they see proper; but above all things, when we are paying fifty per cent. more than they do for the same service, I think it ill becomes us to be criticising them and criticising their conduct about this extra allowance. That is what I think. But whether they pay too much or too little, it is their business. I know the purpose of the Senator from North Carolina is right. I voted with him for the first amendment. I was very glad that it was offered, because I thought it might possibly put a stop to this practice. But this is preventing them from using their own discretion towards their own employes, and I think it improper for the Senate to interfere with it. If we want to pass any more joint resolutions that we shall be economical in the future, I will go with the Senator from North Carolina; but if the employes of the Senate are not paid anything extra for the last session, they will have received, according to all that I can learn, more than the employes of the House of Representatives will have received if this additional pay be given, and therefore there will be no injustice done to those who served the committees of this body, if this be the fact.

Mr. EVANS. It is so in relation to clerks of the committees, but all other officers of the two Houses get the same pay.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then as to the other officers, I am willing to come in at the close of this session to make up a little for them. I shall not agree with the Senator from North Carolina about that; but I think we had better let the House of Representatives settle this matter, and we shall get over this difficulty in that way sooner than in any other way. Part of the money is paid out. We are getting into difficulties.

Mr. BIGGS. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that the end I desire to attain by the amendment which he voted for in committee, and which has been adopted, I thought was a very proper matter for the consideration of the Senate on the information I then had before me; but it was only a repetition of what was done in 1854 and 1857. So I see that the same thing having been done in 1854 and 1857, and disregarded, there is no other way in the world of putting a stop to it but by confining the appropriations to those persons who did not get the benefit of the act of 1854. My first amendment proposes that hereafter this allowance should not be made. I thought there had been no legislation since 1845, at the time I moved that amendment; but, in 1854, there was a joint resolution, and in 1857 it was reenacted. My purpose in this amendment is therefore to cut off all the officers whose compensation was increased in 1854.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, if we go on and pass resolutions cutting off these extra allowances every session, and we find next session that there is no attention paid to them, I ask the Senator if he expects to accomplish anything by going back and making a discrimination among clerks of committees and employes of the House? A part of them got their pay, and a part of them did not. That is my difficulty in voting on this proposition. It is said that there will be that difficulty; and inasmuch as they will not generally be paid as much as the employes of this body, I think we might well enough let bygones be bygones, and I will go with the Senator, and see if we cannot stop extra allowances hereafter.

Mr. EVANS. For the last four years I have had the supervision of the contingent expenses of the Senate, and I remember very well the history of the whole transactions connected with the joint resolution of 1854, for it occurred the first session I was here, and I believe originated with yourself, sir, (Mr. Mason in the chair.) In the first place, a resolution was introduced fixing the pay of our officers and employes. The pay of clerks of committees before that time had been four dollars a day, but upon the motion of a gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Pettit,) it was fixed at five dollars.

Then came the joint resolution of 1854, adding twenty per cent. to all the salaries as fixed by a prior resolution, and forbidding the allowance of the extra compensation which had before been voted. Certain persons—who they were I do not know—who were in the employment of the House, declined to take the additional compensation under the joint resolution, and preferred the extra compensation, which was, I think, about two hundred dollars a year. That was more than the twenty per cent. would be, and they declined to take the twenty per cent., and had address enough to get a resolution passed to compensate them by giving them the extra pay. At the next session they took the twenty per cent., however; but they were not satisfied with that. They went on, then, to get the additional twenty per cent., which has been paid them once or twice. In 1856, this special allowance was made, and I examined into it. The amount is between seventy and eighty thousand dollars, which is paid to the employes of the two Houses—the Senate about twenty-five thousand dollars, and the House somewhere about fifty thousand dollars. There is no difference between the pay of the officers of the two Houses, except the clerks of committees. We have a general provision that all committees may employ clerks. In the House of Representatives they have to obtain permission; and it is usually inserted in their resolutions that the committee have permission to employ a clerk at four dollars a day. When one of these resolutions passes, there are perhaps twenty applicants willing to take the place at four dollars a day. If you were to reduce the price here to four dollars a day, you would get just as good men to perform the duty.

Mr. IVERSON. The motion now is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina was adopted. If the motion to reconsider prevails, the question will then recur, whether the Senate will adopt the amendment? If the amendment be adopted, the third section of the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, will have to undergo amendments, which will have to be concurred in by the House of Representatives in order to pass the bill. I shall vote for the reconsideration, although I am in favor of the principle of the amendment; and if it shall be reconsidered, then, when the question comes before the Senate as to whether we shall readopt the amendment, I shall vote against it; not because I am opposed to the principle of it, but because I believe it injudicious to adopt it now.

In the first place, I think it would be better if the Senate rejects any portion of the bill of the House which makes an appropriation to cover the payments made by the Clerk or by the House in satisfaction of the claims of its employes; it is better the question should go to the House in a naked form, simply as to whether the Senate concurs in the appropriation made by the House for its employes or not. My impression is that the House will not recede from that appropriation; and, if we disagree with the House at all, we had better disagree on the naked proposition as to whether the House has the right, and has acted wisely in making the appropriation for extra compensation to its employes or not. Then the question will come up whether the House has the right or power, and whether it has acted wisely and properly in making this appropriation; and then, in the language of Shakspeare:

"Lay on, Macduff;
And damn'd be him that first cries, hold, enough!"

I shall vote to reconsider, and then vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, because I do not want to embarrass the issue between the two Houses, by any of this collateral matter. I want the question decided whether the House of Representatives have the right, or whether any one branch of Congress has the right to appropriate its contingent fund in its own way, at its own unlimited discretion. Although I admit that the House of Representatives has the power to appropriate its contingent fund, I think that power has a limit. That limit is one of wisdom and propriety. The contingent fund of the House of Representatives belongs to the public Treasury. It is money taken out of the Treasury of the United States; it is a part of the national fund; and the House of Representatives have no more right to waste that part of the national fund, than they have to waste any other portion of the national Treasury.

I admit that the House of Representatives (and so of the Senate) possesses the right under the Constitution and practice of the Government to appropriate and disburse its contingent fund as it pleases, within the bounds of discretion and propriety, and not beyond that. If the House takes any portion of the contingent fund, which is part of the public Treasury, and throws it into the Potomac river, I want to know if the other branch has not a right to say something on that subject? If they make foolish, extravagant, or corrupt applications of money, then I think the other House has a right, and it is its bounden duty, to put its hand on them, and arrest these extravagant expenditures. I would not pretend to control, or attempt to control, the action of the other House upon any question of expediency or propriety. If they had acted within the bounds of reason, and appropriated any portion of the contingent fund, I would say, let them take it, although my judgment might be opposed to it; but if they make an extravagant appropriation, if they make an illegal appropriation, if they make a foolish appropriation, if they make one which is clearly improper, and a monstrous one, then I think it is the duty, as well as the right and power of the other House to put its hand on it, and say you shall not control the public funds in this way. That is my opinion in relation to the power of the two Houses.

I believe, sir, that the House of Representatives ought not to have made this appropriation; and when the question comes up nakedly before the Senate as to whether I will concur in the application made of this fund by the House, I shall vote against it; because I believe it is in violation of every principle of reason, of justice, and propriety, that the House should control the fund in this way. Believing so, I shall not hesitate to vote to strike out the proposition which is contained in the bill from the House of Representatives; but while I do this, I want to present the question to the House in a naked form, unincumbered by any embarrassing propositions, such as the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina would present; and let the House of Representatives then decide whether or not they will recede from the appropriation which they have made; and if they insist upon their appropriation, then let the Senate decide whether they will recede or not. Let the issue be a naked issue between the two Houses upon the power and the right of each House to control its contingent fund, and then let the question be decided. I trust, therefore, that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that the Senate will not adopt the amendment moved by the Senator from North Carolina, but that we shall finally strike out the section sent here by the House of Representatives, and let it go back for adjudication in that House.

There is another suggestion which has presented itself to my mind. It is better to send the bill back to the House of Representatives, incumbered by as few amendments as possible, because we remember how close a vote it was in the House of Representatives to pass this bill at all; and if we incumber it with amendments, we run the risk of losing it. At any rate, I think the public service demands that this bill should not only be passed, but passed as soon as possible. I am not willing, therefore, to risk the fate of the bill by attaching any unnecessary amendments to it in this body.

Mr. WILSON. There seems to be an opinion here in the Senate that the allowance of extra compensation has grown up in modern times. Sir, it commenced sixty-four years ago, in 1794; and has been acted on by nearly every Congress from 1794 until this time. Each House during all that time has had control of its own contingent funds, and these matters have not been repudiated; and if Senators will examine the record, they will find it to be so.

Now, sir, our clerks of committees are included in the act of 1854; they are mentioned in that act; but by resolution last spring, the Senate gave them $360 extra compensation; in the face of that act we did that. We stand in that matter precisely as the House of Representatives does in this, with this difference: we made our provision in defiance and in the face of the law; they made no standing rule, but made it an extra matter after the services had been performed. I think the best way is to agree to the reconsideration proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, and let us leave this section as we found it this morning; and for one, although I agree with the Senator from North Carolina that this policy is all wrong, and will go with him in the future against it, I think we had better settle up the past, and start fair.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Iverson, Kennedy, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—20.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. Briggs.]

Mr. IVERSON. Before that question is put I desire to ask a question of the Chair as to another amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, with respect to future allowances. Has that been adopted by the Senate since we came out of Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been adopted in the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. Is this the proper time to reconsider that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment which has been reconsidered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. Will it now be in order to move to strike out the whole section as amended? The only amendment now that has been made in the Senate has been the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, which is the amendment proposed by me prohibiting any further appropriations for purposes of this kind. We are now in the Senate; that amendment has been adopted in the Senate; and now I ask whether or not it is in order to move to strike out the whole section? I suppose it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair considers it to be in order.

Mr. BIGGS. My object not being attained at all—

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to make a motion to reconsider the amendment of his? That will bring the section back to what it was as it came from the House, and then the motion to strike out can be made.

Mr. BIGGS. It seems to me the object will be entirely attained by a motion to strike out now. My object being to cut off the appropriations inconsistent with the act of 1854; and that not now being accomplished, I am for striking out the whole section unconditionally. I therefore move to strike out the whole section as amended. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire whether, if the motion now made to strike out that whole section, which embraces the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, does not prevail, that vote is not the adoption of the whole section, so that I cannot move to reconsider the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina? If the motion to strike out does not prevail, is it not tantamount to an adoption of the whole as it is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Georgia, that the section just read was reinserted by a vote of the Senate upon a reconsideration, and then a second reconsideration of so much of it as consisted of an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, which was not carried. It is now proposed to strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. IVERSON. It is proposed to strike out the whole section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All that remains, which is the whole.

Mr. IVERSON. What I want to get at is a reconsideration of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I want to get rid of that amendment before the question is taken on striking out or disagreeing with the House on the original section, and I think I am entitled to that precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator. Two amendments were made, on motion of the Senator from North Carolina, one of which has been lost, and it is desired to move a reconsideration of the other.

Mr. IVERSON. I move now to reconsider the other amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. The amendment to be reconsidered is:

And provided further, That it shall never hereafter be lawful for either House of Congress to apply any part of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of such House to any other than the ordinary expenditures of such House, nor to apply any part of said appropriation as extra pay or extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed by the Senator from Georgia, that the vote of the Senate by which this amendment was adopted shall be reconsidered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Cameron, Gwin, Hale, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Sebastian, and Stuart—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Kennedy, King, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—39.

So the Senate refused to reconsider the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to strike out the whole third section, as amended.

Mr. BIGGS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. I was requested to state that the Senator from Maine [Mr. Hamlin] has paired off with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. Jones.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hale, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, Wright, and Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Harlan, Houston, Kennedy, Polk, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wilson—22.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee of the Whole was to insert, as section four:

And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for or applied to the service of any other year, nor be transferred to or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—27.

So the amendment made in Committee of the Whole was non-concurred in.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the Senator if he will not withdraw the motion? I think we can get through with the bill to-day, and get it out of the way.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is another amendment from the Committee of the Whole, to add, as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That whenever hereafter contracts shall be made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, by virtue of the sixth section of the act approved May 1, 1820, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, he shall, if Congress be in session at the time, promptly report to both Houses thereof the reasons for making such contract, stating fully all the facts and circumstances which, in his judgment, rendered such a contract necessary. If Congress be not in session at the time of making such contract, he shall, at the commencement of their next session, make such reports to both Houses. And no such contracts shall be made hereafter, except in cases of pressing exigency.

Mr. HALE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, particularly the Senator from Michigan, to this section—

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is no objection to this.

Mr. HALE. I know there is no objection to this; but according to the construction placed on words like these by the Senator from Louisiana, in the law which he read; and which was passed in 1818, the amendment will not reach the difficulty that it is aimed at.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not intended to meet what we want to guard against.

Mr. HALE. Then I have not anything to say.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are all the amendments adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole disposed of now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move, then, the amendment which I moved in committee, and which was rejected with a slight modification as to a portion of the appropriation. I have added the amount of $1,000,000 for transportation, according to the estimates which were made of what was necessary to be expended to meet the expenditures of the year 1857-58, that is, previous to the 1st of July, 1858. As this amendment now stands, it proposes to appropriate in distinct sums, all that was demanded to meet the deficiencies of 1857, and all that was demanded to meet the deficiencies of 1858, leaving out the proposed additional appropriations for 1859 and 1860; and on the question of the adoption of the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. HUNTER. We know what it is. Unless the Senator desires to have it read, I think we had better take the vote on it. The matter was discussed yesterday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it is hardly necessary to read it. There is only one alteration, adding $1,000,000.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes. I have not spoken on this bill, nor do I mean to throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate now; but, as I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine, I wish to state, as distinctly as I can, the principles upon which I do it. I have not been able to give that attention to the details and to all the points which ought, perhaps, to be well and carefully considered, in order to answer, in a satisfactory manner, the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to this proposition. I mean merely to attempt to lay down the general principles on which I propose to govern my course on this subject.

Mr. President, we have no means of expressing our opinion in relation to the propriety or the expediency, or even the lawfulness of the action of the Executive in regard to the Mormon war, but by indicating it upon some vote which we shall give when the question of appropriation is presented to us. It is not for me, nor is it for this body, to decide whether the Executive has violated any great and vital principle in bringing upon the country this vast expenditure at his own discretion. Nor would it be appropriate and becoming for us to announce any opinion upon that subject. If he has clearly, and if it should appear that he has willfully, transcended the powers of his august position under the Constitution of the United States, it is for another body to inquire into that question. But there are certain striking and prominent facts that cannot be blinked in connection with this subject. I wish that circumstances were such that I could feel myself at liberty to go more at length into the discussion than I am competent to do now, or than it would be proper, under all the circumstances of the moment, after we have had so much debate on the subject on both sides of this question. I say it would not be appropriate and becoming for this body to pronounce any sentiment as to the President's course; but whoever will look at it, and examine it carefully, will find, I feel warranted in saying, that the President, at least, has exercised a very questionable authority. He authorized an expedition to Utah at a season of the year when he was advised, from some sources that we may justly pronounce to be competent, that it was very uncertain whether the expedition could reach Utah at all, and when it was very probable that they would be arrested by the rigor of the severe winters which are almost certain to prevail in the Rocky Mountains until the spring, and that they could not reach the point of destination before they would be so arrested.

I wish gentlemen would carry on their conversation in a lower tone of voice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Chair begs to remind Senators that there is too much conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. BELL. I am informed, though I have not inquired into the details, and have to take the statements of gentlemen whose positions authorize them to speak with more confidence and authority than I can, that if there should be no additional troops ordered to sustain the party under General Johnston, or General Persifer F. Smith, or whoever is in chief command, they have been arrested in their progress to Utah by the rigors of winter, and incurred an expenditure of about five million dollars; and that when we shall now, as I am ready to do, vote to pay whatever has been really expended, it will not be less than five million dollars. Upon what authority, then, of law or of constitutional power, has the President brought upon us the necessity, upon common principles of humanity to our countrymen for the purpose of rescuing that gallant portion of our Army who have wintered in the fastnesses of the Rocky Mountains; upon what authority of law or the Constitution has the President brought upon us the necessity of appropriating these millions? Sir, I am not prepared to say upon the examination I have made, that there is no plausible pretext or ground of authority in previous laws, or under the powers granted to the President of the United States by the Constitution, for supposing that he was authorized to order the expedition into Utah. What I have said of it already goes to the expediency of the expedition which was ordered. I believe it did not set out until near the last of September or the first of October, when the most judicious and experienced and skillful persons connected with the passages over those mountains could with no certainty calculate that they would reach the point of destination before the rigors of winter would set in, so that they could not move at all.

I should thank those gentlemen who are near me on my left and just across the aisle, if they would forbear for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order!

Mr. BELL. I can scarcely hear myself when there is so much conversation indulged near me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already reminded Senators that there is too much conversation.

Mr. BELL. What is the authority of law under which the President has thought proper to institute this war upon the Mormons? Sir, from the very foundation of the Government, any gentleman will find, who chooses to examine the subject, that that is a point upon which Congress have exercised the greatest scruple and jealousy in giving power to the President, at his discretion, to wage war with any people or any portion of any people, either in the States or Territories. In the act of 1792, though repealed by the act of 1795, they were not willing to intrust him with that power for more than two years. This extent of power and discretion granted to the Executive, was on account of the growing difficulties in some particular sections of the Union as early as 1792; and the power to call forth the militia and to use the military force of the United States was only to last thirty days after the commencement of the next ensuing session of Congress.

The act of 1795 is almost equally cautious in the grant of power to the Executive; and at every step in the history of the grant of power by Congress under the Constitution to the Executive on this question, you will find the greatest caution exercised by our predecessors in these seats. The first act passed in 1795 was dictated by the condition of things in the western counties of Pennsylvania. It granted power to the President to call forth not exceeding two thousand five hundred militia, to be stationed in the western counties of Pennsylvania. But even with that power, although extended in a subsequent section to the voluntary enlistment of men, their service was to terminate at the end of thirty days after the next meeting of Congress. The whole power given to the President to call forth the militia and to use the military force of the Union was to terminate then.

Another condition annexed to that power was that either thirty or sixty (I forget which) days' notice was to be given to the insurgent forces to disperse or to lay down their arms, before the President was authorized to employ military force in the suppression of such an insurrection or rebellion. Even in regard to the power of the President to execute the treaties of the United States, which by the Constitution are made the supreme law of the land, he could not remove intruders from Indian territories or the public lands without authority of law, and a limited authority carefully guarded and limited.

This power is claimed, in the present case, under the general authority implied in the duty of the President to execute the laws of the land. That, however, is not different from the duty which has existed during the whole period of the existence of this Government, in relation to carrying out treaties, and executing the laws of the land in our Territories acquired by foreign treaty, or by treaty with Indian tribes. The President has not been permitted to employ a single company of militia or regular soldiers, but in virtue of some specific, express act of Congress. You cannot, by force, remove an intruder from the public lands on the Indian territory, although it is made, by treaty, the express duty of the Government to prevent such intrusion. It has been considered, by our predecessors, that the President has no authority to employ a military force to execute the treaties, unless by express act of Congress—neither militia nor regular troops. Now, sir, I observe that the act of 1807 makes two alterations in the act of 1795. It extends the power of the President to the Territories, and in all cases where he would be authorized to use the militia, under the act of 1795, it allows him to use the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The Chair regrets very much to be obliged to repeat the suggestion to Senators that there is so much conversation, and loud conversation, that it is impossible for the Senator from Tennessee to proceed.

Mr. BELL. I know these gentlemen do not mean anything.

Mr. POLK. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, as I do not suppose he can get through with his remarks this evening, I propose that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BELL. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate long. I only want to give an explanation of my vote.

Mr. POLK. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BELL. I am perfectly willing to adjourn if the Senate desires it; but I want to lay down some distinct ground—

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator will give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BELL. If the Senate want to adjourn, I have no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest that to-morrow is private bill day, and one objection will prevent us going on with this bill; but for that, I would consent to adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD and Mr. HALE. Nobody will object.

Mr. IVERSON. For one, I shall object to interfering with private bills.

Mr. HALE. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn. It is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a remark?

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion for the present, with the leave of the honorable Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not going to make a speech, but I wish to make a remark.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have sat here, Mr. President, for nearly twelve years, and I must confess that I have never met in this Chamber a single day that I have not been intensely mortified that I was a member of this body in some respects. I well remember there was a time when this body was the most decorous, dignified, and respectable body that my eyes ever looked upon. The material here is good enough, but there is a total disregard of everything like order and respect to fellow-members when they are addressing the body. It is not alone that disorder exists in the galleries, but it exists on the floor of the Senate. The rules of the body are such as to enable the officers of it to enforce authority, and to maintain order and profound silence.

Mr. MASON. I must call the Senator to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had permission.

Mr. MASON. There is no question before the Senate except the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is the most important question, Mr. President, that has ever been presented to the body.

Mr. MASON. I call the Senator to order; and I submit that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his point of order again?

Mr. MASON. The question before the Senate is on the deficiency bill, and the remarks of the Senator are not relevant to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the deficiency bill.

Mr. MASON. I object to the remarks of the Senator from Texas, because they are not pertinent to that question.

Mr. HOUSTON. They are most pertinent.

Mr. MASON. I submit the question to the Chair.

Mr. SEWARD. The Chair will indulge me. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has the floor upon the bill. He gave way to make a motion to adjourn. With his leave, I withdrew the motion to enable the honorable Senator from Texas to address the Senate; and now, the motion of adjournment being withdrawn, and the bill coming up, the honorable Senator from Tennessee is the person who has the disposition of the floor.

Mr. BELL. I hope my honorable friend from Texas—

Mr. HOUSTON. I renew the motion to adjourn; but I will claim the opportunity, on tomorrow morning, of finishing my remarks on this subject.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish an adjournment on my account.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 22, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, asking legislation to provide for the transportation of the mails to Bremen and Havre, and also between New York and Liverpool; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BOOKS IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the consent of the House to permit me to offer a resolution in relation to the books now under the rotunda of the Capitol.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, a vast number of valuable books, the property of this House, are lying, without order or arrangement, in the apartments on the ground floor below the rotunda of the Capitol: Therefore

Be it resolved, That ————— be appointed to investigate the condition of these books, to classify them, and to make a report to the proper officers of the House; and that, in this duty, he be allowed the services of an assistant, both to serve at a rate of compensation to be hereafter determined.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will read to the House a short statement which has been placed in my hands, and which throws all the light on the subject that I have. It is as follows:

"A vast number of books, congressional and other, are lying in a room below the rotunda, on the ground floor. Among them are the works of John Adams, packed in numerous boxes. These books are the only ones which lie in any regular order; the rest are piled in immense heaps, without order or arrangement, plentifully intermingled with coal and ashes, and many of them rotten with mold. Among them are hundreds of sets of the United States Statutes at Large, and other of the most valuable congressional publications. It would be almost impossible to give, from a casual examination, any near estimate of the number of these books; though it is evident that their value must be immense."

That is the extent of my information.

Mr. MASON. I would suggest that this matter be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that the resolution was only read for information; and if it is going to give rise to debate, I shall object to its introduction.

Mr. MASON. I only wish to state—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina indulge the Chair in making a suggestion in reference to these books?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, hearing a few days since that there was a large number of books under the Capitol, instructed the Doorkeeper to have them removed. The Doorkeeper at first reported that there were two, three, or four wagon loads; but after the work was commenced, he reported to the Chair yesterday that there were perhaps fifty wagon loads. The Chair went down yesterday evening, and made an examination of the books. A great many of them have been destroyed by mold and rot; but such of them as are of any value at all, the Doorkeeper is now having brought from the old portion of the building, and two or three rooms in this portion of the Capitol have been assigned for the purpose of storing them, and having an inventory made of them. The Chair supposes that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky would be a very proper one; for the labor of cleaning the books and indexing them will be very heavy.

Mr. MASON. I was going to remark that these books do not belong to this House. Some of them belong to the Senate and some to former members of Congress. They have been there for years.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that they have been lighting fires with them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman what name he proposes to put into the resolution? I suppose, if he will put in the Doorkeeper, he can employ an assistant to do the work.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I proposed to put in the name of Mr. Bary, the clerk of our committee.

Mr. COBB. If the resolution is to create new offices, I must object to it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

WISCONSIN RESOLUTION.

Mr. BILLINGHURST, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the Leecompton constitution; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] terminating debate upon the legislative, &c., appropriation bill; to which an amendment, offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] was pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I modify my amendment so as to close debate upon the bill in two hours after the consideration of the same shall have been resumed in committee. I understand the amendment, as modified, will be acceptable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion for a very short time until the bill offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] donating lands for agricultural purposes, which comes up in the morning hour, shall have been disposed of.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. SAVAGE. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, was made the special order for to-day in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I have been trying to get the floor for the purpose of moving to go into committee to take up that bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to state—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely desire to say, if there be no objection, without occupying five minutes or three minutes, that I understand it to be the will of this House and of the Senate to adjourn finally on the first Monday in June. The adjournment on that day cannot take place unless we pay more attention to the appropriation bills. I hope, therefore, that the bill which has been made the special order for to-day will be postponed until after the appropriation bills shall have been passed. Unless the House devotes more of its time to the appropriation bills, the time fixed for the final adjournment of Congress will have to be extended. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Tennessee will consent to have the bill which has been made the special order postponed for the present.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not think this appeal comes to me with good grace, after the many accommodations I have extended to allow the other business of the House to be transacted. This bill has been postponed from time to time, until we have reached this late period of the session; and if the House now postpones it further, I shall consider it as a defeat of the bill. I desire that the House shall understand that the effect of a further postponement will be to destroy the bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to ask if this special order for to-day is not in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then I hope we shall not go into committee until after we have disposed of the bill in the House which comes up in the morning hour, upon which the previous question has been called. It will not take more than half an hour, and then we can go into committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to know if the special order applies in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does not apply in the House at all. It is a special order in committee. Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

The motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES BILL.

The bill (H. R. No. 2) donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, upon which the previous question had been called, was taken up for the action of the House, the question pending being on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The condition of the bill has not been changed since the House has voted upon that motion.

Mr. HUGHES. Is there not a motion to reconsider pending?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is pending. Mr. MILLSON demanded tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and MILLSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 61.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COBB. I want the House to understand this: that the previous question cuts off all motions to amend or refer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the bill and amendment be read, so that members may know exactly what they are called to vote on.

The SPEAKER. The bill and substitute will be read.

The amendment differs from the bill in not extending the proposed benefits to the Territories, and in the addition of the fifth and last clause of the fifth section.

The amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, is as follows:

A bill donating public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be granted to the several States, for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, five millions nine hundred and twenty thousand acres of land, to be apportioned to each State a quantity equal to twenty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress, to which the States are now respectively entitled.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the land aforesaid, after being surveyed, shall be apportioned to the several States, in sections or subdivisions of sections, not less than one quarter of a section; and whenever there are public lands in a State worth $1 25 per acre, (the value of said lands to be determined by the Governor of said State), the quantity to which said State shall be entitled shall be selected from such lands; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to issue to those States in which there are no public lands of the value of $1 25 per acre, land scrip to the amount of their distributive shares in acres under the provisions of this act, said scrip to be sold by said States, and the proceeds thereof to be applied to the uses and purposes prescribed in this act, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever: Provided, That in no case shall any State to which land scrip may thus be issued, be allowed to locate the same within the limits of any other State, but their assignees may thus locate said land scrip upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States, subject to private entry.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the expenses of management and superintendence of said lands, previous to their sales, and all expenses incurred in the management and disbursement of the moneys which may be received therefrom, shall be paid by the States to which they may belong out of the treasury of said States, so that the entire proceeds of the sale of said lands shall be applied without any diminution whatever to the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all moneys derived from the sale of the lands aforesaid by the States to which the lands are apportioned, and from the sales of land scrip hereinbefore provided for, shall be invested in stocks of the United States, or of the States, or some other safe stocks, yielding not less than five per centum upon the par value of said stocks; and that the moneys so invested shall constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which shall remain forever undiminished, (except so far as may be provided in section fifth of this act,) and the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated, by each State which may take and claim the benefit of this act, to the endowment, support, and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific or classical studies, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the grant of land and land scrip hereby authorized shall be made on the following conditions, to which, as well as to the provisions hereinbefore contained, the previous assent of the several States shall be signified by legislative acts:

First. If any portion of the fund invested, as provided by the foregoing section, or any portion of the interest thereon, shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by the State to which it belongs, so that the capital of the fund shall remain forever undiminished; and the annual interest shall be regularly applied, without diminution, to the purposes mentioned in the fourth section of this act, except that a sum, not exceeding ten per centum upon the amount received by any State under the provisions of this act, may be expended for the purchase of lands for sites or experimental farms, whenever authorized by the respective Legislatures of said States.

Second. No portion of said fund, nor the interest thereon, shall be applied, directly or indirectly, under any pretense whatever, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair, of any building or buildings.

Third. Any State which may take and claim the benefit of the provisions of this act shall provide, within five years, at least not less than one college, as described in the fourth section of this act, or the grant to such State shall cease; and said State shall be bound to pay the United States the amount received of any lands previously sold, and that the title to purchasers under the State shall be valid.

Fourth. An annual report shall be made regarding the progress of each college, recording any improvements and experiments made, with their cost and results, and such other matters as may be supposed useful—one copy of which shall be transmitted by mail, free, by each, to all the other colleges which may be endowed under the provisions of this act, and to the Smithsonian Institution, and the agricultural department of the Patent Office at Washington.

Fifth. When lands shall be selected from those which have been raised to double the minimum price, in consequence of railroad grants, they shall be computed to the State so selecting at double the quantity.

Previous to the reading of the amendment, Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, said: Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move that the bill and amendment, and the reading of the latter, be postponed until Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRILL. I object. The bill and amendment have been printed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the reading of the amendment, and I presume there must be some mistake about it. It proposes, as I understand, that double the quantity of land shall be given where the land is selected from the alternate sections of railroad grants. This surely is not what is meant.

Mr. LETCHER. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COBB. What is the first motion to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay upon the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COBB. I reported this bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and have, I believe, the right to be heard on it for an hour.

The SPEAKER. Not now, in the opinion of the Chair; but before the question is taken on the substitute.

Mr. COBB. I can wait until then.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Billingham, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmondson, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Wright, and Zollicoffer—109.

So the House refused to lay the bill and amendment upon the table.

Pending the vote,

Mr. WADE stated that Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, had paired off with his colleague, Mr. DIMMICK.

Mr. RUFFIN stated that he was not within the bar when his name was called, and that if he had been, he would have voted in the affirmative.

MESSRS. KRITT, SCALES, and AVERY made each a similar statement.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire, with the consent of the House, to withdraw that motion.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman has made an hour's speech, and I presume if he wants my time he can have it.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I do not understand that this bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands by the gentleman from Alabama, but by the gentleman from Michigan; and I would therefore inquire whether the gentleman from Alabama can occupy the House for an hour on a bill which he did not report?

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported by the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Michigan only made some motions in reference to it.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman is satisfied on the point of order.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I made the point in good faith. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] reported the bill.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman ought to have known that I am very careful never to get up in the House out of order.

Mr. Speaker, this measure has taken a strange course since it came into this House by report from the Committee on Public Lands. I was under the impression that other gentlemen besides the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] would have an opportunity to address the House upon the question; but motion after motion has been made, until the question has been unexpectedly forced upon us for a direct vote. Of course, under the circumstances, I am compelled to occupy some time in opposition to the bill. My only object will be to state facts, for the information of members; and I will do so as briefly as I can. I do not think I will occupy half of the hour allotted to me under the rules.

In the first place, this bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands adversely. If I could state how that vote stood in the committee it would astonish the country, taken in connection with the action of this House; so entirely different from the action taken by the Committee on Public Lands. It cannot be denied that the opinion prevailed during the last Administration, while I had the honor of being a member of the Committee on Public Lands, that that committee did more business, and committed more high-handed plunder (I use that word) during the last session of Congress than any committee of the House ever before did. Though the opinion prevailed in the minds of many persons that the committee was guilty of those offenses, I deny it. We certainly did make liberal grants of land during the last Congress; and I voted, with two exceptions, for all of them. I am satisfied with the action of the committee at that time.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman whether there was one single measure which passed this House during the last session, emanating from the Committee on Public Lands, and which received their sanction, that he, as a member of that committee, did not vote for in the committee?

Mr. COBB. I say emphatically that there was a measure I did not vote for.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Name it.

Mr. COBB. I name the grant made to Minnesota, and I challenge contradiction.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. My recollection is that the gentleman voted for it.

Mr. COBB. Does the gentleman say I did? That is the way to put the question. I say emphatically I did not.

The SPEAKER. The action of the Committee on Public Lands of the last Congress is not a matter of comment pending the present bill.

Mr. COBB. I have gone as far on that subject as I desire to go. I am happy the Chair did not rule me out of order before. I proceeded as I did, in order to contrast the action of the present Committee on Public Lands with that of last Congress, and in order to show how this House regards the action of that committee. If I dared to speak of the action of that committee on this subject, I would say that but two members of that committee voted for the measure. But that would be unparliamentary, and I will not say it. The Committee on Public Lands have, this session, determined to husband the public lands, and to economize their grants, in order to husband the means which the Government is to receive from the sale of those lands. Would it not be astonishing, when the Committee on Public Lands report back this bill to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass, that the House should take it under their own peculiar power and determine to override the will of the committee which has intended to husband the public lands? I am satisfied of one thing: that my friend, who catechised me so much last Congress for voting for these railroad grants, and not only so, but that my constituents who held me to a strict accountability for voting for them, will be surprised to see me standing up here defending the action of the committee, and trying to husband the public lands at this session of Congress.

Every member of the House undoubtedly understands what the bill proposes to do; and therefore I shall consider it very briefly. I wish to show, from the report I made, that it is not, nor has it been, the policy of this Government, with one or two exceptions, to grant lands for such public purposes. The bill proposes an inauguration of a new system, the result of which no man can foresee. Certain it is that the result will not be a good one.

As to the propriety of making a grant of lands for such purposes, I refer to my report, and I propose to read it as a part of my speech. This is the report:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (No. 2) making a grant of land to the several States and Territories of the Union, for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, beg leave to make the following report:

That they unite with the friends of the bill in an appreciation of the merits of the object to which the proposed grant is intended to be applied; and if those merits could alone determine the conclusions of the committee, they would most cordially recommend the passage of the bill. In the judgment of your committee, however, there are other considerations which demand attention before they can come to that conclusion. The General Government is one of limited powers. At its formation, the respective States, as separate but independent communities, were amply empowered to regulate and provide for all matters within their limits; but a sense of weakness, as against foreign Powers, impelled them to a Confederation and the formation of a Government competent to the general protection. To this end, and for this purpose, special powers were conferred upon it. But while the States conceded the authority which was deemed necessary to the ends for which it was formed, they each retained within themselves all the powers necessary to the independent management and control of matters not involving the interests of the citizens of the other States. Competent as they were to all domestic matters, they only sought to establish a Government which should provide for the interests of the Confederation in its aggregate capacity; and, jealous of their separate independence, the States reserved to themselves, respectively, all power not necessary to the General Government for the end for which it was formed.

This limitation of power in the hands of the Federal Government, except so far as specifically granted, denies to it all authority to act in relation to the domestic affairs of the several States, and has established the only solid foundation for the perpetuation of the Federal Union. Under this principle its limits may forever be extended, and its safety preserved. Various, and even conflicting, habits, customs, and local interests, in the different States, will be protected by their Legislatures, and are in no danger of being overridden by the Federal Government; and, if each keeps within its appropriate sphere, the prosperity of the States will be secured, and the interests of the Union will be enlarged. Such is the symmetry of our Government, its very existence depends upon its severe adherence to the limitation of its duties. Within that, it has no power but to bless; beyond it, it has no power but to ruin. This limitation is the anchor of our safety; when it fails, it will involve the ruin of the Republic. If the General Government possessed the power to make grants for local purposes, without a consideration, within the States, its action, in that respect, would have no limitation but such as policy or necessity might impose. Every meritorious object would have a right to demand it; and to such a refusal could only be justified by inability. Every local object for which local provision is now made, would press for support upon the General Government, and would create demands beyond its power to meet, and, of necessity, it would be driven into the policy which would increase its means. As its expenditures are increased the revenue must be enlarged, and the General Government, by the adoption of the policy, would levy taxes upon the people of the Union for the support of the local interests of the States. If their expenditures should be unequally apportioned, the injustice of taxing a part for the benefit of others would soon cause the system to be overthrown. If they were equally distributed, it would be but a usurpation of the functions of the States, unsustained even by the plea of economy. The patronage would be fatal to the independence of the States; with patronage comes the power to control, as consequence follows upon cause.

If the policy is embarked in, what shall be its limits? Shall the merit of the object and the ability of the Government be the boundaries of its action? To feed the hungry and clothe the naked, if within its competency, would, in a moral point of view, be quite as meritorious as any other act which the Government could perform; but, if the Constitution had granted power for such a purpose, would it be politic for Congress to make provision for the suffering poor throughout the Union? If either lands or money could be granted for the purpose designated in this bill, could they not, and ought they not, to be granted to the building of churches, erecting school-houses, and the keeping up the common schools in States and Territories? If to one meritorious object, why not to another? Or shall the action of Congress in this regard be extended to every useful public and private purpose within the States? If not, where shall the line be drawn? If the principle be admitted, what shall limit its application? Your committee have failed to perceive how they could be justified in recommending a grant from the General Government in support of agricultural schools, and in refusing one for any other object equally meritorious. The means of the General Government are taken from the people; if you take from it the public lands, you give it money in the stead; if you destroy its revenue from that source, you must increase it in some other. No more expensive mode could be devised to support local institutions than to make the Federal Government the agent to raise and distribute the means. With the States lies the power necessary to their management and control. With the States lies the power to secure an economical administration of the funds, and to determine the amount which prudence will allow to be expended in their support; and if these institutions are supported by means raised by the authority of the States, no injustice can be inflicted upon the people of the other States. State provision, as between the States, would be just from necessity, and from interest it would be economical. The appropriation asked for is in lands, but your committee can discover, in this regard, no difference between an appropriation in lands or one in money; the effect is precisely the same in both cases. If the revenue from the public lands is destroyed, the deficiency must be met by taxes on the people.

The public domain belongs to all the people of the United States; their interest in it is common, and the Government is but the trustee for the common benefit, limited in its actions over it to those powers conferred by the Constitution. It is a part of the public funds, and can be devoted to no purpose forbidden to the money of the Federal Government. If Congress impairs its value it must receive a compensation, or it will be faithless to its trust. The public good forbids the Government from extorting from the purchaser's necessities an exorbitant price for the public lands; but while the public welfare limits it to a reasonable action in this respect, the public rights demand that some compensation should be exacted, and such a reasonable revenue be secured from the public domain as, without being oppressive upon the purchasers, should be equitable towards those who do not obtain the enjoyment of the soil. Such are the principles, the recognition of which justice imperatively demands. As a landholder, the Government may legitimately bear a share of the burdens imposed, to create an improvement which will enhance the value of its domain, and may contribute to that end; yet its aid must be limited within the extent which does not require taxation to effect it. It may, as a matter of power or right, contribute portions of the public lands to improve the value of the remainder; but even in this, sound policy and its duties towards the general welfare will limit it to a healthy and reasonable extent. Reasonable donations towards improvements which cause an increased value in the adjacent lands are consonant with a wise and just administration of the public domain. Such donations increase, and not impair, the value of the trust; but a gift which reduces the value of the public lands is in violation of the beneficiaries' rights. The donations of section sixteen for the support of the township schools was an inducement to purchasers, and enhanced the value of the adjacent lands, the sale of which indemnified the Government for the donation which it made. So, too, the donation of the salines. The facilities for obtaining salt were among the first objects of the early settlers upon the public lands, and the donation of the salt springs, and adjacent lands, to cause their being worked, was a powerful inducement to the pioneers of the West. The grants to the new States, upon their admission into the Union, were upon conditions which more than indemnified the Government.

The swamp-land grant was justified, because it was to remove a nuisance which injured the public and the Government as the proprietor of the adjacent lands; while the grants for internal improvements brought a direct pecuniary profit to the Treasury. Your committee are aware that a few instances can be found where the action of Congress has not been limited to the principles which we avow, but, in our judgment, these instances warn us against them as precedent of wrong. In extreme cases the laws are silent, but the cases form no rule. In ordinary cases, when the precedent is wrong, it should be condemned. It is always an ungrateful task to refuse; but when duty demands it, our committee feels that it dare not disobey. Our sympathies impel us to extend a generous support towards some of the objects for which donations of the public lands are asked. If our feelings could control, we should most cordially do all that their friends could desire; but we live under a Government of laws, and the merit of the object cannot justify the appropriation of means not our own. Want seldom inquires into the right of plenty to give—its own necessities are its highest law. The ability of the General Government naturally causes applications to it for assistance; and without inquiring into its right to comply with their demands, the needy press upon the Government for support. To support local institutions does not come within the scope for which the General Government was formed; and, if it possessed the power, your committee can imagine no policy more unwise. The public domain is a source of revenue. In time of war it is one of the most effective means upon which the country can rely; it will secure enlistments when money fails; and, in our opinion, we should indeed be careful before we destroy this important aid. The public lands are watched with a longing eye.

Your committee have now before them, exclusive of the cases where there is a promise of compensation, applications for grants of land, money, and other objects, the most of which, if not all, we feel bound to reject. Our land system has been well and happily devised—under it, injustice has been done to but few, but most have prospered. It has furnished a moderate revenue without preventing the settlement and improvement of the domain. New States have sprung up on it, whose prosperity is the admiration of the world. Industry has the price of the public lands within its reach; and the policy which made it has caused the wilderness, not only to bud and blossom, but to bring forth fruit. The new States have been encouraged; the old States have had their interests secured; the spirit of our Government has been obeyed, and its duties kept within the limits of the law. Shall all this be disregarded, and the system overthrown? For what? If the prayers of the petitioners were granted, the prodigious quantities of land which would be thrown upon the market by competing vendors would deprive it of marketable value. The very gratification of their wishes would destroy the objects they have in view. To make the grants would be to render them of but little avail. Your committee conclude that Congress, without a promise of pecuniary compensation, has no power to grant portions of the public domain; and if it had, no policy could be more unwise than to grant it for the support of local institutions within the States. They therefore ask leave to report adversely to the indicated bill.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

W. R. W. COBB,
Chairman of Committee on Public Lands.

It remains to me only to allude to the effect of this bill. How much land do you suppose the State of New York would get under this bill? Twenty thousand acres to each Representative would give to the State of New York, which has an area of 29,440,000 acres of land, 700,000 acres. I mean to say, that if the bill passes—but I have no fears that it will pass, for there are several other ordeals which it will have to pass through before it becomes a law—it will give the State of New York 700,000 acres of land. Iowa, with an area of 32,548,960 acres of land, gets, under this bill, 80,000 acres, while she is susceptible of having her whole territory filled up, and of sustaining a population as large as that of New York. Then you see how unequally this bill operates. Iowa gets 80,000 acres, and New York gets 700,000. Do gentlemen expect that they will be able to get a supplemental bill passed after a while, so as to place their States on an equal footing with other States, such as New York? I doubt it very much. California has an area of 287,162,240 acres of land; and under this bill she only gets 80,000 acres. Will California sell her birthright for a mess of pottage, as Alabama has often done in the votes of her Representatives for railroad grants? Arkansas, with an area of 33,406,220 acres, gets, under this bill, 80,000 acres, while her population will probably be trebled or quadrupled in twenty years.

From the best sources of information now at hand, the present population of Michigan is 800,000; Wisconsin, 750,000; Iowa, 600,000, and California, 600,000. Here these four States, with an aggregate population of 2,750,000, would at this time, by an equal distribution upon the present ratio of representation, be entitled to 640,000 acres; yet under this bill they get but half that amount. And yet these facts do not truly present the unfairness of the distribution by this bill, for while the new States, by the rapid increase of their population, are entitled to more, the old States are entitled to less representation in Congress. Therefore, in this ninth year of the present decade, congressional representation is no fair basis upon which to make a distribution of public lands for agricultural colleges, or any other purpose.

And that brings me to another point. The gentleman proposes by his amendment to exclude the Territories from the benefit of this bill. Utah, with an area of 140,925,440 acres, would have got, under the original bill, 20,000 acres; but according to the amendment, will get nothing. So with Minnesota, with an area of 90,776,960 acres, and which might be entitled as a State, within a few days after the passage of this bill, if it do pass, to 80,000 acres. So with Washington Territory, with its area of 80,000,000 acres; and with Oregon, with its 125,000,000, I will not say anything about Kansas, lest I might disturb the harmony of the House. I have got here a tabular statement showing the area in square miles and in acres of the several States and Territories, and the land to which each would be entitled under this bill as amended. It is as follows:

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COBB. The gentleman will excuse me. He knows that I am only a humble farmer; and I do not wish to be thrown out of my line of argument. The Committee on Public Lands have determined, this session, to husband the public lands as much as possible; but, notwithstanding that, this bill proposes to give away some six million acres to the States, while the Territories are altogether overlooked. You find the Territories often neglected in this way; but, whenever they come in as States, and have their Senators in the other branch of the national Congress and their Representatives here, then their rights are respected and their political favor courted. I am ashamed to say that I have myself often neglected the Territories because they have no votes. But it was wrong; and I censure my own action on former occasions, and admit that it was wrong.

Now, one word more, and I will close. When members of the House and the people of the country come to read the report on this bill, and see the position I assume in it, and remember my votes in relation to grants of lands for railroad purposes, they may be curious to know how I can reconcile my vote against this bill, meritorious as it is, with the votes which I have given in favor of those railroad grants. It is a very easy matter for me to reconcile those votes to my own satisfaction; but, whether I shall be able to satisfy everybody else, it is not for me to determine. I hold that the grants to States and Territories for railroad purposes increase the value of the public lands; and they not only increase their value by promoting settlement, but they bring into market thousands and millions of acres of the public lands that perhaps would not otherwise come into market for sixty years. The Government, therefore, receives an equivalent for the lands granted; but in this case the Government is to receive no consideration whatever—not one dollar. And not only that, but the States which receive the lands are to be taxed to the amount necessary to build these institutions; for they are not to be allowed to apply any of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, either the principal or the interest, to the erection of the buildings, and so forth, for these colleges. I can well understand why the friends of the bill from the State of New York are in favor of it; they have their agricultural college already established, and under this bill will get seven hundred thousand acres of land to aid them. In Michigan I understand that the same is the case. The State has already been at the expense of establishing the institution.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have a still more difficult job before me, and that is to reconcile the vote which I shall give in relation to this bill with the vote which I gave upon another bill. And I cannot perform it without simply coming down and acknowledging frankly that I was wrong in the votes which I gave, when the impulses of this heart, whether good or bad, prompted me to act in behalf of a proposition to grant lands for the establishment of insane asylums in the States—a proposition gotten up by Miss Dix. I do not know from what portion of the country she comes; but she is a meritorious, generous, and noble-minded woman. She went down into my State, and her charms had such an extraordinary effect upon the people of that portion of the country that the Legislature of my State adopted a joint memorial to the Congress of the United States, without a dissenting voice, requesting their Representatives and instructing their Senators to vote for that bill. Then it was, sir, that I gave way to my better feelings, and voted for that bill. I had not examined the constitutional question as thoroughly as I admit I ought to have done; and when the President's veto message came in, and I did examine it, I became perfectly satisfied that I had voted wrong. I have the consolation of knowing, however, that my motives were good. I have the consolation of knowing that my erroneous action arose from the impulses of a kind and generous heart, and from a desire to aid the unfortunate class for whom that bill proposed to provide. I acknowledge, to-day, that I did wrong, so far as the constitutional question is concerned; but my own heart told me that the measure was right in itself, and the gratification and approval of my own heart amply compensate me.

But, sir, I am going to leave this question. I suppose that, if this bill passes, the people of every State will have a right to ask Congress to provide for their common schools and other local institutions. The poor will have a right to come and ask Congress to grant lands to aid in the erection of buildings to shelter them from the inclemency of the weather.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will be patient, I shall soon be through; but he cannot take me off the floor by any motion he can make. I feel that I have violated the promise which I made to the House when I took the floor, that I would be brief. I owe an apology to you, sir, and to the House, for the time I have consumed upon this subject. I did not intend, when I rose, to consume more than a few minutes; but I have felt it my duty to say what I have said. I hope I may be permitted, although it is not in order, to apologize for what I may call the promiscuous speech which I made yesterday. [Laughter.] I have not read it yet, and it is very probable that, when I come to look it over carefully, I may strike it all out; and I hope the House will grant me that privilege.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have refrained from making the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table, in order to accommodate gentlemen who are interested in this bill, and I will still refrain from submitting that motion, if the vote can be taken upon the bill at once and without consuming further time than is necessary for the vote to be taken: otherwise, I shall feel it to be my duty to move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, in order that I may move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the special order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope we shall dispose of this bill. I make the point of order that a motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table is not in order, as the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion pending to go to the business on the Speaker's table. The first question is upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. MORRILL. In order to save time, I will, with the consent of the House, withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is objected to. Mr. MORRILL. Then I ask those who are in favor of the bill to vote down the motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Order, sir.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McQUEEN. This amendment has never been before the Committee on Public Lands; they know nothing about it.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that it should have been before the committee. The gentleman from Vermont offers his proposition as an amendment to the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McQUEEN. I understand that; but it was never before the committee. It was never heard of there.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I find that this bill is going to occupy too much time, and I shall have to make the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I then move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask if that motion is in order during the pendency of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand the rule to be, that, after the main question has been ordered, no motion is in order except to lay on the table, to adjourn, and to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. I think motions for a call of the House, and all other motions, have been decided to be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The rule upon the subject provides that a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be in order at any time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the practice of the House has been as I have stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the practice has been as the gentleman has stated.

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. SAVAGE.) Withdraw your motion.

Mr. SAVAGE. I should be very glad to accommodate gentlemen, if I could; but they will have the morning hour in which to dispose of this bill. I think it important that the debate upon the pension bill should be commenced in committee to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. We are not in the way of the gentleman's bill. Let us vote upon this bill, and then go into committee.

Mr. SAVAGE. Can we get to a vote upon this bill without further debate?

The SPEAKER. No further debate is in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I withdraw the motion, then. The question being first upon the motion to recommit to the Committee on Public Lands,

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Billingshurst, Becock, Bonham, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clements, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Ward, Watkins, Winslow, Woodson, and John V. Wright—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Conning, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, John Sherman, Sickles, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollcoffer—105.

So the bill was not recommitted.

The question then recurred on Mr. MORRILL's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Conning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollcoffer—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Becock, Bonham, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Winslow, Woodson, and John V. Wright—100.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Conning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Elisha B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whitely, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollieffer—102.

NAVY.—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bocoock, Bonham, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockrell, Cox, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Morris, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quesada, Rangan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tally, George Taylor, Ward, Watkins, Winslow, Woodson, and John V. Wright—91.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL moved to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "and Territories," so as to make it read, "A bill granting lands to the several States," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The title, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to give notice to the House in reference to a privileged question. I give notice that I expect, to-morrow at one o'clock, to make a report from the committee of free conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, informing the House that he had approved and signed bills, originating in the House, of the following titles:

An act (No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana;

An act (No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson; and

An act (No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki.

Also, that he had approved and signed an act (S. No. 202) for the relief of Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army.

PENSION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SAVAGE, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BURNETT in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration, as a special order, of the bill of the House (No. 259) granting pensions to officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, we are called on to-day, by order of the House, to consider a question of the greatest importance to the Union; and I do not know that I ever felt less equal to any task than the one before me on this present occasion. Yet, I am assisted in my task by the character of the subject I am here to advocate. It speaks to the hearts and patriotism of the people in a manner that can gain nothing by eloquence or logic. Nevertheless, sir, so far as I have been able to see, the question does not seem to be understood correctly. The objections which have been raised to it, both in this House and out of it, when examined, will be found to have nothing in them.

All great causes, in my opinion, are best advocated by simple and clear statements; and it will be my endeavor to state briefly the ground upon which I support this bill. It is true that history might be appealed to, and the experience of the past called to adorn it. Yet, it is not my intention, on the present occasion, to go into those things. My wish is to consider this as an American question, as a question of the present hour, and as a question applicable alone to this nation. As a question of policy, it has not had a parallel in the past, and it appeals to our common intelligence quite as forcibly as to the proofs of history.

I state it, Mr. Chairman, as a self-evident proposition in the present condition of the world, that every nation must rely for its safety upon some system of military defense. The idea of a nation maintaining its independence without a military policy is an absurdity too gross to be refuted. The question I present to-day to the American people is this: what kind of a military system shall we adopt? Who shall be the guardians of American liberty? Who shall be our defenders against the foreign foe and domestic usurper? Shall we adopt the policy of other nations, and tread the pathway of those whose history has already been written in ruin and blood? Ought we not, on the contrary, endeavor to establish a system different from that of those nations, and which, in all future time, will accord with our American institutions? I take it as a proposition of common sense, that if we pursue the course of European nations, we will quickly tread the pathway of their destiny and follow in the common ruin to which they have gone.

Most persons do not look beyond the old soldier and his misfortunes, his necessities and his rights. That is a potent argument, and I always look upon him with the deepest sympathy. Yet there are other considerations, and important in their character, which are connected with the future of our country, and which are more potent to urge me to action. But I am happy while I find our citizens ready to sympathize with the sufferings of the old soldiers, and I am happy to know that that is a common feeling among all classes, to honor these monuments of our second war of independence. Yet, sir, it is my object now to examine this subject in its bearings upon our future safety. True, the old soldier, with his rights and necessities, is one branch of the argument in support of this bill; but the other branch is more important, looking as it does to the establishment of a military system for this Government in all time hereafter. It is a system different from all those which have preceded it, and which, in the future, will furnish defenders to the country. It is a great American system to provide for repelling the foreign foe and quelling domestic insurrection. This is the question presented, which cannot be evaded or gainsayed. Will you adopt it as proposed by this bill, or will you adopt a system founded upon those of European nations? Will you resort to those systems which have crushed the people of Europe with enormous military establishments? Will you do that, or will you adopt a system which will furnish soldiers ready at the tap of the drum to rush to the standard of the Union and bear it on to victory and glory? One of these alternatives must be taken.

I say to those who vote against this bill, that when they vote against a pension list they vote for a standing army upon the continent of America as certainly as if it were written in the statute book—"Be it enacted that an army of one hundred thousand men shall be irrevocably fixed upon the American Republic." Gentlemen may not wish that thing, but as certain as the night follows the day it will happen, if we refuse to adopt some plan of rewarding the citizen soldier. If it had not been for the spirit of our people what would have been our history? If you crush that spirit, if you discourage it, if you frown upon it, if you turn a cold ear to it, if you neglect it, it will no longer exist; and when your drums sound, when the war gust comes, those gallant men who, in times past, have been your glory and safety, who have come from every class of life—from the farm, the workshop, the counter, and the lawyer's office, will not again, as they have done, throng to the rush of battle and the din of arms in defense of this land. You may wake the nations of the world by the sound of your drums, and these men will not answer your summons. Then this system of standing armies, the curse of other nations, and the cause of the downfall of those which have heretofore existed, will fasten itself upon the nation like a consuming canker, and fatal to your liberties.

Now, sir, need I appeal to the history of the past? I state it as another self-evident proposition, proved by all history and all common experience, that a nation of soldiers must always be a nation of freemen; and that none but a nation of warriors can be a nation of freemen. Having military power and virtue, they will never impose a tyrant upon themselves, and an ambitious conqueror, with his chosen few, cannot erect a throne of power upon the bosom of the many.

So, then, I advocate this measure as the great conservator of peace. When I wish to form a soldier, it is not for purposes of war and foreign conquest; but that it may be known to the usurper, to a foreign foe, and to all mankind, that American citizens are their own soldiers and do their own fighting, and that the hope of crushing us by armed usurpation may exist nowhere upon the face of the globe.

I propose to allude to a few national examples, in proof of what I have said; and I look to republics for arguments, rather than to monarchies. I want to take your minds back to the old Roman Republic. In the days of her glory, power, and prowess, every man was a soldier. The people controlled the destiny of the nation even under her kings, whose first acts of tyranny banished them and their posterity forever, and made the Government in form what it had really been in fact. In this condition she achieved her greatest foreign conquests, and maintained peace and civil liberty at home, to a far greater extent than in after years, when the people of Italy had forgot the use of arms. It is written that these once masters of the world now employed themselves in the most profligate luxury, rivaling each other in extravagant entertainments, while the defense of the nation was committed to some ambitious general, who trained his mercenary band to love his order better than the State. Such a thing as Roman liberty was not known after the establishment of these mercenary bands, who were as ready to march against Rome herself as against a foreign foe.

Look, again, to Athens and Lacedemon. At the time of their greatness every man was a soldier; and the historian says that even the lowest of them was a commander.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Were they pensioned?

Mr. SAVAGE. I will answer the gentleman that question in proper time. It was when every man was a soldier, capable of doing military duty, and having the will to do military duty, that they achieved their glory, and enjoyed the benefits of science, liberty, poetry, greatness, and power, and won a fame which is perhaps now the brightest that graces the annals of time.

The gentleman asks were they pensioned. I do not contend that they were, yet there were certain public inducements held out to those men which were necessary to sustain their courage and make them patriotic. And I remember an instance in the history of that ancient people eminently illustrative of what is necessary to sustain military virtue. Mankind, without some security, some hope, or some expectation, are not going to perform those great military deeds. It is the love of glory, or the hope of reward, that make men brave, and incites to generous deeds. Napoleon nearly conquered Europe, and it was one portion of his system to satisfy his soldiers at all times, that if they lost a leg or an arm, or were crippled on the battle-field, that the Emperor had a generous hospital where he could have refuge in his misfortunes, and during his old age quiet and comfort down to the last hours of his life. The gentleman asks were the Athenians and Lacedemonians pensioned. He has not studied this question, or he could not have asked that question. I cite one eminent example, where the Lacedemonians were unsuccessful in every battle. They had fought battle after battle; and, notwithstanding their former fame and all the laurels they had won, they were unsuccessful. They sent to the Athenians to send them their best general; but they sent a man more distinguished for poetry than for military renown, yet he had the good fortune to hit upon an expedient which restored the Lacedemon success. The Lacedemonians feared to be dishonored upon the field of battle. It was their common belief that the man who was not buried could not go over the river Styx. The Athenian general hit upon the expedient of paying proper attention to the dead upon the field of battle. He established a law that all dead soldiers should be buried decently. That one thing revived their courage, and victory again perched upon their banner.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 110.

cost. I would be glad to see the opponents of this bill exhibit a calculation, based upon facts and accurate statements, instead of denouncing it in round numbers and by unsupported declarations. Let them show how otherwise they avoid an increase of our present Army to an enormous establishment, which now numbers fifteen thousand, and costs us at the rate of $19,000,000 per annum. Shall it in a few years number forty or fifty thousand, with a corresponding increase of expense? This Army of ours is and has been growing a little too fast to suit my notions of a free Government.

I have a calculation by Mr. Calhoun, when Secretary of War, of all that was paid to these soldiers of 1812 for the whole time of service—it amounts to $12,618,967 38. Yet gentlemen talk as if this bill was going to pay them $12,000,000 per annum, now when more than nine tenths of them are in the grave. By reference to a report heretofore made to Congress from the War Department, which may be seen in the second volume of American State Papers, I find that the whole cost of the Army during the eight years of Jefferson's administration, was $6,385,559 84, which is something less than the deficiency called by the Quartermaster General and voted by the present Congress. I am for stopping this increase of military expenses, and for a return to what seems to have been the policy of the country in years gone by. I am willing to keep up West Point, or even to increase the facilities for the education of our young men, so as to send military science throughout the land, and have men in civil life, living among the people, capable of rallying them in times of danger to the preservation of their liberty and independence.

The regular Army should always be a very small part of our national safety—this will be otherwise unless we encourage military service from among the people. Refuse to pass this bill, and you will teach a lesson which will have its effect upon this country a thousand years. You will waive off from your standard the brave men who otherwise would offer their lives to give the nation safety and glory.

The old soldiers of the late wars of this country are found in every hamlet, in every neighborhood; and round them cluster the glories which we so much love to cherish. Their appeals will be heard; and their claims upon us cannot be cast aside or forgotten, let your action be what it may. Refuse this bill, and the mothers and grandmothers now living will not be unmindful of the lesson. They will teach it to their sons. Then the emulation to volunteer for the country's defense, and to defend her well in the time of battle, will have gone, and the result from this must be the growth upon our body-politic of the huge incubus of a standing army. A mother will tell her son when she is about to be called hence: "My son, obey me in this: whatever betides, do not join the army. All round me are those who stood up in 1812 and battled for the country's cause. They are stricken with poverty and bodily weakness; they have appealed to their country for help, and their country has denied them help. They went to the wars—some perished on the battle-field; many by sickness; others returned wounded, crippled, diseased, and unable to secure a livelihood, as they had been before; while those who remained at home have gone on prospering and growing rich." This will sink deep into the young heart. They will see that a country does not deserve their ardent affection, that cares nought for those who have suffered in her cause. Soon, when the sound of war comes, we will have no more the scenes of volunteers struggling to be enlisted, but we will have, in their stead, the train-bands of Europe; then the commander-in-chief, with despotic will, will rule his hosts; and it may be, at the end of a long struggle, that he will enthrone himself in power over an enfeebled nation, to reign as the inheritor of all the glories of the American name.

Will you refuse this pittance to your soldiers? Will you deny it to them when such extravagant expenditures are required for the present army?

The bills of mortality show that one fourth of these seventeen thousand men will die year after year. So, then, while the expense under this bill will decrease, the opposite system of regular establishments increases in expense and power to perpetuate itself most rapidly. It is well suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] for which I thank him most kindly, that the probable expense proposed by this measure will not exceed the printing bills of Congress for a single session; and I say there is not a matter of expenditure usual in the Government but what the economy of this bill may be compared with most triumphantly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FENTON obtained the floor.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me a moment, that I may ask the gentleman from Tennessee what he means by this language, contained in the first section of the bill?

"Or shall have been engaged in active battle with the enemy in the war declared by the United States," &c.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will explain, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, as it is a very proper question. I made time a material matter. I would say, however, that the word "active" should have been printed "actual." I considered that, if a man had been in the service three months, he was entitled to a pension; but I did not consider it the duty of the country to pension a man who had not served that period of time. But then I knew that there was such a thing as a man getting into a battle, and such a thing as keeping out of it; and I was willing to give to a man who had not served three months, but who nevertheless had the good fortune or diligence to be engaged in a battle, a pension in the same manner as if he had served three months.

Mr. FENTON. At the time this bill was reported to the House by the gentleman from Tennessee, I offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which was printed, and gave notice that I should present it whenever the bill should come up for consideration. I now send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read.

The amendment was read, and is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the pensions which have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted, to officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, artificers, rangers, sea-fencibles, volunteers, express-riders, seamen, marines, pilots, engineers, firemen and coal-heavers, and other persons in the land or naval service of the United States, disabled by wounds or other injuries received while in the line of their duty, shall be considered to commence from the time of their being so disabled; and the amount of pension to which said officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, artificers, rangers, sea-fencibles, volunteers, express-riders, seamen or marines, pilots, engineers, firemen and coal-heavers, and other persons, may be entitled, shall be regulated according to existing laws in relation to the pay of invalid pensioners: Provided, That the amount of pension which any persons above named have received shall first be deducted from the pension to which he is entitled under this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death of any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, private, artificer, volunteer, express-riding, sea-fencible, pilot, seaman, marine, engineer, fireman or coal-heaver, or other person mentioned in the first section of this act, before or after the passage thereof, the amount which may be due to such person under the provisions of this act shall be paid to his widow; and, in case of her death, to her surviving child or children; and, if none, then to the next of kin of the persons provided for by the first section of this act.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee further than opposition may be implied in the substitute I have offered. I propose, in this substitute, that we shall carry out the contract made with those men who entered the military service of the country in 1812. I propose to ingraft no new principle upon the legislation of our country. I simply ask that my proposition may come before the committee to be acted upon concurrently with the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, or that it shall have priority. I ask that we shall do justice to those men according to the understanding under which they entered the service in 1812. I find the same language that pervaded the act of January 14, 1812, held up to them at the time of enlistment, running through all the legislation of the country, from its earliest history down to 1820.

In looking over those acts, I find that the people of this country ever regarded it as a duty to sustain those who became disabled in military service. In 1775, the Continental Congress promised pensions, during the continuance of disability, to the officers and soldiers of the Army, disabled in service. In 1785, the same body strongly urged upon the State governments to make provision for such invalids as were residents of their respective States; and it was among the first acts of the First Congress under the Constitution, to provide for the payment of pensions granted by the States. Subsequently, the whole matter of invalid pensions was assumed by the Federal Government, and ample provision made, not only for those that were disabled in the war of the Revolution, but also for those disabled in subsequent wars and in the peace establishment.

The fifth section of the act of August 11, 1780, authorizes the payment of arrears of pension due to invalids.

The third section of the act of August 11, 1790, provides for the payment of invalid pensioners, to commence from the time when they became entitled thereto.

The fourth section provides for the payment of any arrears of pension due to any deceased invalid pensioner, to his widow, or orphan children.

The third section of the act of March 23, 1792, provides that officers, non-commissioned officers, soldiers, or seamen, disabled in the actual service of the United States during the late war, by wounds or other known cause, who did not desert from said service, shall be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States during life, or the continuance of such disability; and shall also be allowed such further sum for the arrears of pension from the time of such disability, not exceeding the rate of the annual allowance in consequence of his disability, as the circuit court in the district in which they may respectively reside may think just; provided that the rules and regulations of the act in making proof be complied with, &c.

Such were some of the laws of the old Congress; and a careful examination of them will show that they adopted the principle of paying invalids from the date of their wounds.

The fourteenth section of the act of March 16, 1802, provides,

"That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, in the corps composing the peace establishment, shall be disabled by wounds, or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pay, and under such regulations as may be directed by the President of the United States for the time being," &c.

Various pension laws fix the rate of pensions to officers at half their monthly pay for a total disability, and in proportion for inferior disabilities; and to non-commissioned officers and privates, at full pay, for a total disability, and in proportion for a lesser disability. Their compensation, however, has not always been uniform. A private now receives eight dollars per month for a total disability, and a non-commissioned officer receives no more.

The fourteenth section of the act of January 11, 1812, to raise an additional military force, provides:

"SECTION 1. That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall be disabled by wounds, or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pension, and under such regulations, as are or may be directed by law."

I am not aware that any executive regulation as to the commencement of invalid pensions has ever been made.

The foregoing acts are more particularly applicable to invalids of the Army.

The act of April 22, 1800, relates to invalids of the Navy, and provides:

"That every officer, seaman, or marine, disabled in the line of his duty, shall be entitled to receive for life, or during his disability, a pension from the United States, according to the nature and degree of his disability, not exceeding one half of his monthly pay."

And a similar provision is contained in the act of March 2, 1790, section eight. These laws were in force during the war of 1812, and have never been repealed. It was in view of these provisions that many brave men presented their breasts to the enemy and received the blow which was aimed at their country.

How did our soldiers understand these laws when they entered the service of the United States? Why, as every man of common sense would understand them—that if he should become disabled while in the line of his duty in the public service, he should receive a pension according to the degree of his disability, for life or during disability; and it was the uniform practice of the Pension Office, previous to 1820, to commence invalid pensions from the date of the disability.

On the 15th of May of that year, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to continue in force an act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received during the revolutionary war, and for other purposes," the third section of which provides:

"That the right any person now has, or hereafter may acquire, to receive a pension in virtue of any law of the United States, shall be considered to commence from the time of completing the testimony in the case, pursuant to the act hereby revived and continued in force."

In my judgment this act relates, and was at the time intended to relate, exclusively to the invalids of the Revolution. No other application can be made without an impeachment of the good sense, the honor and justice of that Congress, towards those who had entered the military service of your country to defend its flag and maintain its rights in the war of 1812, at whatever hazard to health and life, and sacrifice of the endearments of family and home.

In this view I am sustained by eminent authority, and will be allowed to adduce that of Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, when Attorney General of the United States. In giving his opinion in the case of General Ripley, (see page 387 of Mayo's edition of Pension Laws,) he says:

"All persons entering the Army under that act were therefore bound to know that if disabled they could not receive pensions as invalids, so long as they retained their places in the Army, and received the pay and emoluments thereof." But I am distinctly informed by the Commissioner of Pensions, that this was the only limitation imposed by the usage of the office, prior to the act of 15th May, 1820, on the payment of pensions for disabilities under the act of 1812; and that where the party left the Army at the time he was disabled, the pension was considered as accruing from the date of the disability, no matter when the testimony was completed or produced. "This being the case, all persons who entered the Army under that law had good reason to expect, that if they should become disabled they would be allowed pensions according to the nature of their disabilities, to commence from the time when they should cease to receive the pay and emoluments of the service. The contract between them and the Government was not precisely to that effect, because it was subject to the contingency, that the President might prescribe other regulations which might limit still further the commencement of the pension; but as this power has not been exercised, the case may be considered as standing precisely on the same ground as though it had not existed."

But Colonel Edwards, who had control of the Pension Office in 1820, and for more than a quarter of a century afterwards, decided otherwise; and the regulations established by him have mainly governed since. Indeed, they seem to have grown into a right, by prescription, to commence invalid pensions from the completion of the evidence; and however unjust the rule, it has been adhered to since the time he was in office, and no subsequent officer has taken the responsibility, however repugnant to his sense of justice and right and law, to wholly disregard it, and carry out the laws of Congress according to their plain intent and meaning.

The effect of this construction was to repeal the laws of Congress, and repudiate contracts which were made by the Government with the soldiers when they entered the service. Hence my object in introducing this bill, or substitute for the bill of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] is to procure, by act of Congress, a construction to the existing laws, in harmony with their spirit and meaning, and so that they may receive their pensions from the date of their disabilities. I propose no change of the principle long since established by the Government, and carried out in good faith in a period of our history when we were less competent to pay these honorable and just demands than we are now. Shall it be said that the Representatives of a people, now great in power and resources, in whose ears the echo of the valor of those brave men still rings, are reckless to the obligations of contract and promise made to them when they entered the service? I will not believe it; nor will I believe that, for an age beyond, when our people shall only know of their sacrifices and achievements by tradition and history, any will be found unwilling or tardy in discharging the last, lingering obligations to those gallant veterans.

It has been the practice since 1820 to pay those who were engaged in the naval service of the United States from the date of their disabilities. The principle and intention of the law towards Army invalids has been asserted by numerous acts of your Congress within the last thirty years. Every man present knows how these invalid pensioners come down to the Hall of Congress year after year, and ask you to pass special acts for their relief, placing them on the roll of invalid pensioners from the date of their disabilities, instead of from the date of the completion of their proof. Why is it, then, that you will hesitate in allowing these men pensions in accordance with what was the understanding at the time they entered the service? Was it not a contract that the Government entered into with these men? Their claim has become a vested right, and they have a right to demand it of you. You are sufficiently liberal in making appropriations to carry on the affairs of the country. You are munificent in many other respects. But when these soldiers come to the doors of Congress and ask for a few hundred dollars, you refuse them their prayer. How unjust! Why not place the soldiers of the war of 1812 on an equal footing with each other? Why give an advantage to those who made applications for pensions previous to 1820, which you will not give to those who, whether from ignorance of their rights, from pride of circumstances, or from inability to complete their proofs, did not apply till after that date?

I have a case in illustration of the injustice of such a practice. A few years ago—and since 1850—I am informed that a soldier who was in the battle of Plattsburg, where two thousand of our militia men drove back fourteen thousand British troops, made application at your Pension Office. He had been wounded by a musket ball in his leg, was thrown into the hospital, and had suffered amputation. His officers were killed in battle, and his company scattered throughout the country, so that he was unable, until lately, to make the necessary proof, in order to comply with the construction of the law, as given at the War Department. He was told there that his case was a good one, and that he would be placed on the pension rolls from the date of the completion of his proofs. He asked: "Am I not to be placed back on an equal footing with my comrades in the service? I have been unable to maintain myself. I have been obliged to throw myself on the sympathy and aid of kind friends. Instead of my being a support to my family, they have supported me; and now you propose to turn me away with the humble pittance of ninety-six dollars a year, after the date of the completion of my proof. I will go to Congress, and ask that justice which you deny at your Pension department."

But, Mr. Chairman, the amount involved is not large. To carry out the provisions of this bill will require but a comparatively small amount to be taken from your Treasury. On looking over the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, I see that for the year ending June 30, 1857, the number of Army invalids on the rolls was four thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight. It is supposed that about one third of that number have been receiving pensions from the date of their disabilities, leaving three thousand two hundred and sixty-five to be provided for under this bill; and it is estimated that it will require, on an average, $500 to pay each man, making an aggregate sum of $1,632,500.

Of the 54,838 soldiers of the Revolution who were pensioned under the acts of 1816, 1823, and 1832, only 346 remain, according to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year ending June 30, 1857. The amount paid annually to this class of men, during the last sixty years, will more than pay the sums due the invalids of 1812. Pensions were allowed those brave men of the Revolution not only on account of their services and sacrifices, but because the country will "eternally keep the tablet of gratitude bright" towards those who achieved our independence as a nation. Pensions to invalids of the war of 1812 and subsequent wars proceed upon a different principle. They grew out of a promise made by Congress before and at the time they entered the service, and may well be said to have formed a contract between the Government and the soldiers—when both were free to make it—founded upon considerations of patriotism, protection, and defense; and most nobly did the soldier perform the duty assigned him. They protected the legacy left by the heroes of '76, and preserved our patrimony of freedom from stain and dishonor.

National justice, good policy, the dictates of a common humanity, and the feeling of just gratitude demand this act at our hands.

I shall propose, before I take my seat, to add three sections to my bill, or substitute, with a view of carrying out in part, and as far as practicable at the present time, in my judgment, the object sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from Tennessee.

But I have placed the invalid soldiers first, because I think the Government should be just before they are generous. These wounded men come here and ask us to fulfill our contract, fairly made with them when they entered the Army, and I would not have the Government higgie with a wounded or disabled soldier as to the time when his pension shall commence. Whenever he proves that his disability commenced, his pension ought to commence from that period, without regard to the time when his proof was perfected or completed. There is only one class of soldiers' claims pending before Congress which may be said to have equal merit with the invalids of the war of 1812. I allude to the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, recommended to us by the Legislatures of New York, Maryland, and Virginia, and petitions from every part of the country, and for the relief of whom I had the honor, early during this session, to refer a bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and I am gratified to know that the same received the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and has been reported to the House without alteration or amendment. To those men, and the heroes of our second independence, we are indebted for the seats we now occupy, for this splendid Hall, for the immunities and blessings we enjoy, and for our greatness and glory as a people.

I find, in looking over the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office for the present year, that the territory won by the arms of those patriots, amounts to one thousand four hundred and fifty-eight million acres, besides the inestimable boon of liberty and independence which we now enjoy. To meet the promises of Congress to these men, this entire territory, by the act of 1790, was pledged to the payment of the revolutionary debt; and I trust that this Congress will see to it that the injustice which has been done to these men shall no longer be a reproach and a stain upon the national honor. We have already received from the sales of these lands more than one hundred million dollars, and the yearly income from that source will average about six millions. The soldiers of the Revolution have the first mortgage upon the public domain, and the soldiers of the war of 1812 have the next claim, to the income, at least, for they nobly maintained our country's rights, sustained the honor of our flag, and gained what may well be termed our second independence.

I know very well that in the present depleted state of the national Treasury it is impossible to do justice to all those who have entered the service of our country. I would be glad, under certain rules and regulations, to go with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] in establishing the principle, however novel it may be, since the days of the Revolution, of giving pensions for services as well as for disabilities. With this end in view, I propose to amend my substitute by incorporating into it the principle of the bill of 1832,

* "Previous to 1820, it was the practice of the Pension Office to commence invalid pensions from the date of the wounds, and in many cases it has been done since. The last Congress allowed the pension of General McNeil from the date of his wounds, in addition to his pay as an officer, and the amount was made payable to his widow."

which is simply full pension for twenty-four months' service, half pension for twelve months, and a quarter pension for six months.

I know that many performed meritorious services who were on military duty for a less length of time, equally so to the extent of time they were in the service—some for three months; some less—those who were of the drafted and volunteer force for thirty and sixty days in the States.

In Connecticut this class prevented the recapture of the Macedonian and our other ships of war by the British fleet, which held them blockaded up the river Thames. But while we cannot do full and complete justice to all of that class of men, let us go as far as we can, trusting to another occasion, a more auspicious day in the financial condition of our Treasury, to triumphantly vindicate our appreciation of the services of all, and a nation's gratitude to all her brave sons.

Mr. Chairman, I now modify my substitute by adding the sections which I send to the Clerk's desk:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That each of the surviving officers, musicians, soldiers, and Indian spies, who shall have served in the regular Army, State troops, volunteers, or militia, at one or more times, a period of two years during the war with Great Britain declared by the United States on the 18th day of June, 1812, or in any of the Indian wars subsequent to the war of the Revolution, and previous to said 18th day of June, 1812, shall be entitled to an annuity or pension equal to his full pay in the line, according to his rank, but not exceeding in any case the pay of a captain of infantry; such pay to commence on the 4th day of March, 1858, and continue during his natural life; and that any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, as aforesaid, who shall have served as aforesaid a term or terms in the whole less than the period of two years, but not less than six months, shall be entitled to an annuity or pension, each according to the term of his service, bearing such proportion to the annuity granted for the same rank for the service of two years as his term of service did to the term aforesaid, to commence on the 4th day March, 1858, and continue during his natural life.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person who would be entitled to a pension under the third section of this act, if living, have died, or may hereafter die, leaving a widow, such widow shall be entitled to receive, during her widowhood, the same annuity or pension that her husband would have been entitled to if living, to commence on said 4th day of March, 1858, unless her husband shall have survived that date, and received a pension under this act, in which case, her pension shall commence from the day of his death.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the annuity or pension hereby allowed shall not be in any way transferable, or liable to attachment, levy, or seizure, by any legal process whatever, but shall inure wholly to the personal benefit of the officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or soldier entitled to the same, or to his widow.

Mr. CURRY obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, I will move that the Committee rise.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, with the leave of the gentleman who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CURRY. I have no objection.

Mr. COBB. I merely desire to give notice to the committee that I shall propose to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "twelve," in the ninth line, the words "and the Florida and Creek Indian wars of 1836, 1837, and 1838," so as to include those who served in those wars, or their widows.

Mr. FLORENCE. I give notice that I shall offer the following as an amendment to the bill:

That all persons who are or who may be on the invalid pension rolls of the Army, Navy, and marine corps of the United States, shall be entitled to receive pensions at the rate of not less than eight dollars per month for disability of the highest degree, and for disability of less degree proportionately less; such pensions, in each case, to commence from the occurrence of the disability on account of which they have been or may be granted: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to lessen the pensions of those who, by special or other legislation, are or may be entitled to pensions of a higher grade, or to impair any right thus acquired; and that such higher pensions for disability shall be graded in conformity with the assimilation mentioned in the next section of this act.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That if any person has died, or shall die, by reason of injury received, or of disease contracted, while in the line of his duty as a commissioned or non-commissioned officer of the Army, Navy, or marine corps of the United States, or as an enlisted man or "boy" of either of said branches of public service, and shall have left, or shall leave, a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow, during her widowhood, or, if there be no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to receive a monthly pension, to be computed in amount according to the pension laws in relation to the Navy now in force: that is to say, the widow, child, or children, as aforesaid, of a general officer, colonel, or lieutenant-colonel of the Army or marine corps, shall be entitled to the pension now allowed by law to the widow, child, or children of a captain of the Navy; and, in like manner, the several other ranks of the Army and marine corps, in respect to pensions, shall be assimilated to those of the Navy, as follows: a major to a commander; a captain to a lieutenant; a lieutenant to a master; a surgeon, an assistant surgeon; and a chaplain to similar grades in the Navy; a sergeant major, an orderly or first sergeant, an ordnance or quartermaster's sergeant, a principal musician, and a hospital steward to a boatswain; all other sergeants and enlisted master-workmen to a boatswain's mate; and the widow, child, or children as aforesaid of any other non-commissioned officer, enlisted man or "boy" of the Army, Navy, or marine corps as aforesaid shall be entitled to a pension of eight dollars per month; the said pensions, in each case, to commence as do similar pensions in the Navy.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in the event of the death or marriage of such widow, the pension aforesaid shall therefrom be paid to such child or children; but in all cases said pension shall cease when such child or children attained, or shall attain, the age of sixteen years, or died, or shall die, before that age.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in all cases of application for a pension, which have been or may be made under this or any previous act now in force, in relation to the Army, Navy, or marine corps, it shall be presumed that every such person was either disabled, or (as the case may be) that his death was caused, as aforesaid, while he was in the line of his duty, unless it be proven that such disability or death resulted from vicious conduct, immoral habits, or otherwise, as prohibited by the laws governing, respectively, the Army, Navy, and marine corps.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the pensions hereby provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

I further give notice that I shall introduce an amendment to provide for certain persons who were engaged in service in 1818, and in the war with Mexico.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I give notice that I shall offer the following amendments:

After the words "Great Britain," in line eight, section 2, insert the following words:

And also all others who served as soldiers either in the regular Army, volunteers, or militia, in any Indian wars between any of the Indian tribes and the United States from 1783 to 1795, and subsequently until 1812.

Insert, after the word "twelve," in line nine, section one, the following words:

And also any soldier who served in said war in the regular Army of the United States, militia, or volunteers, who can show that, by reason of exposure or other hardships endured, he is now an invalid, and unable to maintain himself by his labor.

It may appear strange to the House that there has never been any provision made for Anthony Wayne's army.

Mr. LETCHER. I would inquire of the gentleman why he does not include the Florida war, the Whisky insurrection, and the Mexican war?

Mr. FLORENCE. And the Buckshot war?

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to give notice that I shall, at the proper time, offer an amendment to the bill extending the benefit of its provisions to those who served in the Army of the United States prior to 1818, so as to embrace those men who served with General Jackson in his Florida campaign.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. Chairman, with the leave of the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to give notice that, at the proper time, I shall move an amendment to the bill to include those gallant soldiers of our own State, Kentucky, who went out under the command of General Hopkins, who were engaged in a toilsome march, and who were more exposed to danger and starvation than almost any other men who were engaged in the war of 1812. I desire to have them also included.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to submit a proposition to print the several amendments of which notice has been given, so that the members of the House may be able to give them due consideration before they are called upon to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot be received in committee.

Mr. DAWES renewed his motion, and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. BURNETT) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration as a special order, the bill of the House No. 259, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have printed the various amendments, of which notice was given in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object; and move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like, at the same time with the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to have it referred to a committee to ascertain how many wars we have ever had, and what would be the cost of pensioning the whole set. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the Committee on the Library would be the proper committee to obtain that information.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I insist on my motion. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 23, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting reports of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying papers, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th of January last, which was submitted by Mr. SEWARD, calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession, derived from the United States squadron on the coast of Africa, or from the British or French Governments; or any other official sources, concerning the condition of the African slave trade, and concerning the movements of the French Government to establish a colonization in the possessions of that Government from the coast of Africa.

The message was read, and, on motion of Mr. STUART, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWARD subsequently said: The answer of the Secretary of State to the call of the Senate, made some time ago, for correspondence with foreign Powers concerning the slave trade, was ordered to be referred this morning, in my absence, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I move that the communication be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I should be glad to ask a question of the Senator from New York, who has obtained this order for printing. It is granted without any reference whatever. I am not aware that the document is before the Senate, but I understand there is not a little of it. Will the Senator explain it? Otherwise, I must move to reconsider.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will let it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know what the difficulty is. The paper came in yesterday, and was referred this morning to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask that it may be printed. It is voluminous and very important.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it a short paper?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir. It is a communication of the correspondence of foreign Powers concerning the slave trade.

Mr. MASON. It is a very interesting correspondence, to the country, on the subject of the relative action of the British and American Governments in regard to the suppression of the African slave trade.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope it will go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS.) The Chair will remark to the Senator from New York that the motion was entertained under unanimous consent, because, under the rule, it must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection that it shall go to the Committee on Printing, if they desire to examine it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Committee on Foreign Relations say it ought to be printed, I shall make no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I happened to be out on a committee of conference at the time, and the honorable chairman was out; but the committee desire that it shall be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I shall interpose no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to present a petition

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that this day being set apart for the consideration of private bills, it is not in order to consider any other business, unless otherwise directed by the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I only want to present a petition.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no objection to waiving the taking up of the Private Calendar until we get through with the ordinary morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard that as the sense of the Senate, unless objected to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Charles Grampp, praying that his pension may be made to commence from the date of his disability, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of Samuel V. Merrick, William C. Ludwig, Charles Macalister, and S. Morris Waln, trustees, appointed at a meeting of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the bill to establish certain ocean post routes between the United States and Europe, and to regulate the transportation of the mails thereon, and to reduce the expenses thereof, now before Congress, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MASON presented a memorial of citizens of Jefferson county, Virginia, praying the location of a national foundry at Shepherdstown, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. POLK, it was Ordered, That the petition of James T. V. Thompson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Captain John B. Montgomery, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 2) donating public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859—to the Committee on Finance.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SEBASTIAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to extend the pre-emption laws of the United States to the reserved sections of land within the grants to railroads in Arkansas, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Bernard M. Byrne, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 282) for the relief of Bernard M. Byrne. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of James Maccaboy, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 283), for the relief of James Maccaboy. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of C. Edward Habicht, administrator of J. W. P. Lewis, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 284) for the relief of C. Edward Habicht, administrator of J. W. P. Lewis. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

WAGON ROADS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a wagon road from Fort Smith, in Arkansas, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico; and from Fulton, in Arkansas, to El Paso, in New Mexico; and report by bill or otherwise.

INDIANA MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Mr. IVERSON. If there be no further morning business, I move that we take up the special order, being the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of pre-emption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends.

Mr. MASON. This is a proposition, as I understand, to grant a portion of the public lands to a religious society for the purposes of that society, which are, as far as I can understand the bill from the reading of it, prescribed in the act, undertaking, on the part of Congress, to regulate matters with which, in my humble judgment, we have nothing to do. I did not distinctly hear the bill, for I was interrupted at the moment, but I understand that it was to give them a pre-emption right. That policy has been instituted by the Government, and is a very wise policy for the purpose of securing the actual settlement of the lands by the citizens of the United States, not for the purpose of making donations to charitable institutions. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Virginia today, as on a former occasion, has stated what he understood to be the bill, and without giving any opportunity for correction, has concluded his speech by some motion, intending to put an end to the whole affair. Now, the Senator has altogether misapprehended the bill. He entirely misunderstands the case which is before the Senate. I do not think it is possible for any Senator to examine the question without being in favor of the passage of the bill.

Nearly half a century ago, Mr. President, when the Shawnee tribe of Indians were wild, living in the northwestern portion of the State of Ohio, this Society of Friends, through three of its organizations nominally—I believe, the Indiana Meeting, the Ohio Meeting, and the Baltimore Meeting—undertook the pioneer mission to the Indians in that portion of the country. They established their school—for it was only a school for Indian children—at Wapakousta, in the State of Ohio. The whole care of the mission belongs to the Indiana Meeting, which is the party named in the bill. The Government of the United States bought the lands of the Shawnees, extinguished the Indian title in Ohio, and removed them to Kansas Territory, and they gave them the lands on which they were finally settled. They were not lands of the United States any longer. The fact is, I believe, they had a patent from the United States, issued by President Tyler.

In 1854, about the time the Territory of Kansas was organized, a treaty was concluded with the Shawnees, in which they reserved to themselves two hundred thousand acres of land, stipulating that certain proportions of that reserved tract should inure to the benefit of the missions established among them. Here is the section. I should have contented myself with stating the substance of it, but for the fact that there seems to have been such a disposition to put the bill off without learning anything about it. Here is the second article of the treaty, or rather an extract from it:

"Of the lands lying east of the parallel line aforesaid, there shall first be set apart to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to include the improvements of the Indian Manual Labor School, three sections of land; to the Friends' Shawnee Labor School, including the improvements there, three hundred and twenty acres of land; and to the American Baptist Missionary Union, to include the improvements where the superintendent of their school now resides, one hundred and sixty acres of land; also, five acres of land to the Shawnee Methodist Church, including the meeting-house and grave-yard; and two acres of land to the Shawnee Baptist Church, including the meeting-house and grave-yard."

This was a stipulation inserted by the Indians themselves, in order to secure the continuance of the mission schools organized by these religious societies. It is in no sense a donation for any religious society as such. It is simply to protect the schools established for the civilization of the Indians; and I do not know that it is any demerit in the school that its teachers belong to either one or another religious denomination. Although these were established as missionary schools by religious societies, they are schools; and as I say, I do not think the schools are any the worse because they are under the control of religious societies.

The Indians stipulated that these two hundred thousand acres of land should be reserved to them; that they would take out of them these grants here named, and any other grants that might be necessary to give a certain quantity for all the Shawnee people, so much to the heads of families and those who are not, and that the residue of the tract should be reserved five years, and during those five years, any of the Shawnee people scattered and settled outside of the reservation, who might come in, should be entitled to have head rights or family rights, and the balance of the tract, after that, should be sold by the Government, and the money paid over to the Shawnees.

Now, sir, it is discovered that the Shawnee Labor School, established by the Society of Friends, is not so favorably situated in the location of the lands set apart to it by the treaty as the Methodist society, which has three entire sections, there being but one half section set apart for the Society of Friends, and the Indians themselves in council have designated a tract of land to be added to that for the purpose of furnishing woodland to enable the school itself to be kept up. The Indians in council appropriated it out of their own land. An application was made to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to confirm the location. It was their land, it was their school; they were satisfied with it. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs said he must refer it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he commended it to his attention. This very bill was drawn by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs last in office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office reported that he could not confirm this location under the acts of Congress then in force, as it did not come technically within the pre-emption laws, and he advised the parties to apply to Congress. An extract of his letter is contained in the report of the committee, commending it to Congress.

Now, instead of looking into the case, Senators have risen three or four times—and not one Senator, but three or four of them—to set up a real ghost, a stalking horse in the Senate, that we are going to grant out the public land in immense quantities to religious societies, and that it is setting a new precedent. Why, sir, the first precedent I know almost in the history of this Government of a grant of public land, is a grant to the United Brethren, commonly called the Moravians, to induce them to civilize the Indians. It was a grant to a religious missionary society for the express purpose of establishing schools among the Indians. I believe it is one of the first grants in the history of the Government; but that is not this case. I only state that to show Senators that it sets no precedent at all. This land belongs to the Shawnees; they reserved it in their treaty with us. They owned the whole tract, and had a patent for the whole tract, and they agreed to surrender it up to us at a certain valuation, all excepting these two hundred thousand acres of land. They propose out of that land, which is theirs, and the proceeds of which are to go to them, if there is any surplus, to enlarge the temporary grant to this school, so as to enable it to be made more efficacious. As I said, they are willing to do it; the Indian Office is willing to do it; the Land Office is willing to do it; and the Committee on Public Lands has twice reported in favor of it. The bill passed the Senate at the last Congress, and failed in the House for lack of time; and now when it comes up at this session, as often as the bill comes up, some Senator rises and says if he understands it, it means thus and so, and thereupon he wants it laid on the table without waiting for any explanation. It seems to me that the proposition is trifled with, and I say so with all respect. It is a fair proposition. It proposes nothing dishonest.

At my suggestion, in committee, there was a section added to the bill to guard against any possibility of abuse, providing that they should never sell the land without the consent of Congress, so as to prevent the least speculation. I have no doubt that if it is found necessary, for increasing the usefulness of the school, that the land shall be sold, Congress will grant the right to sell it; but, for the express purpose of preventing any speculation, I inserted that clause.

Now, sir, what does the bill propose? I come lastly to that. It proposes that they shall have the title to this tract of land, which is given to them in the treaty, in the first place—for it is given to them—and, in the next place, that they shall have the privilege of paying the Government $1 25 per acre for the rest of the land that the Indians are willing to give them. It is absolutely not our land; it is land that we have guaranteed to this tribe of Indians; but I have required, and the parties are willing to pay this Government, $1 25 per acre for land that the Government does not own, and cannot even get.

Mr. BROWN. In that connection, will the Senator explain to me why it is that the three hundred and twenty acres additional to the tract reserved in the treaty, and which it is proposed to let these parties enter under the provisions of this bill, are not located in connection with the land they already have—why it is a floating privilege to carry it anywhere over the country?

Mr. PUGH. I will tell the Senator why it is necessary. It is stated in the report, and was made to appear to the committee and to the executive officer. This reservation in the treaty only includes the buildings and farm-lands; it includes no timber land; and, at the present time, the mission has no access to any woodlands; and, if they go upon any timber reservations, the Government of the United States would be after them with its officials for trespassing upon the public lands. The three hundred and twenty acres to be added by this bill is a tract of timber land—nothing else in the world.

Mr. BROWN. But I cannot understand of what advantage these three hundred and twenty acres of land can be to the mission unless located in connection with it; and I find, on reading the bill, that they are to locate anywhere on Indian soil; it may be two hundred miles off.

Mr. PUGH. You are mistaken, sir. A description is given in the bill.

Mr. BROWN. The reading of the bill is this:

"In addition to the three hundred and twenty acres set apart to the Friends' Shawnee Labor School or Mission by the said treaty; such location to be made upon any of the said lands which will belong to the United States after the Indians shall have made their selections, as provided by the said treaty."

It does not require that it shall be located in connection with the other.

Mr. PUGH. The report specifies the lands the Indians have already designated. They have already designated the tract themselves. It is stated in the report.

Mr. BROWN. Precisely; but that does not meet the point. What I apprehend is, that this is an attempt on the part of this mission to get some valuable town-site or some property of great value, because if they wanted three hundred and twenty acres of land for the benefit of this mission, they would take land in connection with what they have, and take the nearest three hundred and twenty acres that happen to be vacant, but when they go all over the face of the country to be allowed to locate three hundred and twenty acres anywhere, it looks to me very much as if it is an attempt to get a town-site or something else that has a particular value attached to it.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator may have the bill amended in that regard—there is no difficulty on that score. As I said, the bill was drawn by the late Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but that point never attracted my attention, because I knew that the tracts of lands are particularly designated, and it is stated in the report what they are. They are selected. Here is the tract:

"The Yearly Meeting of Indiana therefore asks permission to locate and purchase as a preemption right, at $1 25 an acre, two tracts in the neighborhood of the mission-farm, namely: one hundred and twenty acres west of the farm, and two hundred acres on the south side of the Kansas river."

I knew that it was specified. If it is not done in the bill, it is because I trusted the Commissioner to draw it up; and I shall not object to the Senator's amending the bill in that particular. I shall not detain the Senate any longer.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it was understood, when we adjourned yesterday, that we should take up the deficiency bill to-day. I hope it will be taken up.

Mr. PUGH. Let us have a vote on this bill one way or the other.

Mr. HUNTER. If there could be a vote without debate, I should not object; but I know there will be opposition, I know there will be speeches made. I must take the sense of the Senate on taking up the deficiency bill. I move to take it up.

Mr. BROWN. Can that motion be made without altering the rule? The Senate is sitting under a resolution appointing this day for the consideration of private bills. I do not understand that we can, without a day's notice, change the rule.

Mr. HUNTER. It is not a rule. It is a mere order of business, the same as we make in regard to other special orders. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not interpose in the way of the deficiency bill. Let us get through with it. I think that was the understanding when we adjourned yesterday.

Mr. BROWN. I did not so understand.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it was the understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) In the opinion of the Chair, a majority can set aside this bill for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I make that motion, to postpone all prior orders and take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the Senator would give way and let this bill pass. The hour of one o'clock has not yet arrived.

Mr. HUNTER. I would give way if I did not know that this bill would be debated. We cannot pass the bill under an hour's debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. We cannot debate it ten minutes longer if we try.

Mr. HUNTER. I make the motion that the deficiency bill be now taken up.

Mr. IVERSON. Does the Chair decide that it is competent for a majority to set aside the resolution passed some time ago setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair. A majority of the Senate have a right to dispense with that order of business, and take up any other.

Mr. IVERSON. The impression my mind derived from older Senators was that it could not be done without unanimous consent. I know that the Chair this morning, when it was not occupied by the present incumbent, when it was moved to introduce petitions, stated that it could only be done by unanimous consent. I yielded; and therefore petitions were introduced. The President pro tempore of the Senate, as I understood him, decided that it required unanimous consent to waive the order of the day. I think the present occupant is wrong in his decision. I will appeal to older Senators, however.

Mr. STUART. The Senator will allow me to say that it has been the uniform decision of the Senate, I think, that an order made in this way becomes a rule of the Senate. The question has been raised here several times, since I have been in the body, and it has been uniformly decided that it required one day's notice to change it. I do not make this suggestion because I object to taking up the deficiency bill; but I am anxious that there shall not be an erroneous decision on this question; because, if so, our private bill arrangements will be ended for the session; for somebody will be continually moving to postpone them, and, by talking about it and voting about it, we shall lose private bill day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have been here for some years, and I am very certain that, if the proposition that is now presented to the consideration of the Senate by the Senator from Michigan can prevail justly, or should heretofore have prevailed justly, there would not have been a single Friday that would not have been devoted to private bills; and yet, I know that we have constantly passed private bills over on Fridays. Now there is one little bill here which is producing this kind of excitement and this kind of exaction of the public business which is to set aside business of far more importance.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a word.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. STUART. It is a very short time since this order was made. I say that when such an order has been made by the Senate, the decision has been, that after it is made it cannot be set aside without the unanimous consent of the Senate; and I call the attention of the Senator to a case that occurred when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was under consideration. It became necessary to give one day's notice of an intention to move to set aside just such an order as this, and it was done.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope very much that the decision of the Chair will be sustained if the gentleman takes an appeal.

Mr. HUNTER. There is no appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If there is no appeal, it is unnecessary to discuss it. I will say, however, that at this time of the session, when we are trying to bring our work up to the 7th of June, and when we are compelled to do it, or else rescind the resolution adopted by the two Houses, (an operation which is not very easy, by the way,) I hope we shall not give a different construction from that stated by the Chair, and thus delay the public business for the consideration of such as that which is before us. As to the bill before us, I certainly shall oppose it, and I know there are others who will do so; and I think I can show grounds on which you cannot get a majority of the Senate to pass that bill to-day.

Mr. IVERSON. I must take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, unless the Senate come to some arrangement about the Private Calendar. It has been usual through all the Congresses heretofore to take up the Private Calendar regularly on Fridays, about the 1st of April, at the long session. I think the order setting apart Friday for private bills, at the first session of the last Congress, was adopted on the 24th of March, and from that time to the end of the session, every Friday was appropriated to private bills. I obtained an order from the Senate during the month of March, or about the 1st of this month—I do not remember particularly the time—setting apart Fridays hereafter for the consideration of private bills. Instead of complying with that order, the Senate has devoted but a single day this whole session to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If that is the case, it is the Senator's fault. He has not insisted that the rule is what he now contends for.

Mr. IVERSON. I beg pardon; it is no fault of mine. The Senate set aside the Private Calendar by proceeding to other business of a pressing character. I did not interpose objection, though I was anxious to have the private bills considered. I yielded and yielded, until my patience was exhausted, and I will not yield again without some arrangement.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator had no right to yield before.

Mr. IVERSON. I am willing to yield to the deficiency bill to-day, provided the Senate will make the Private Calendar the order for to-morrow. If they do that, I will yield; otherwise, I will not; and I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. If the Senate will, by general consent, agree—

Mr. MASON. I shall give no consent.

Mr. TOOMBS. Nor I, either.

Mr. MASON. I deem it a matter of the last importance that the business of the Senate should be under the control of the Senate, and more especially as we have now fixed the day for adjournment, and are all anxious to adjourn. To ascertain whether that order is subject to the control of the majority of the Senate, let it be read, that we may see what it is. If it is the rule of the Senate, it requires one day's notice. If it is a mere order, it can be disposed of by a majority.

The Clerk read the order, as follows:

"Resolved, That for the residue of the present session, after this present week, Friday of each week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills, in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, and others. That is not a rule.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to know, then, what it takes to constitute a rule?

Mr. MASON. A rule is one of the regulations prescribed by the Senate, in the nature of a fundamental law, only to be changed in a certain way.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. A rule, too, is permanent, and lasts from year to year; but this is only for the remainder of the session. It is a mere order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not desire to interpose any objection to the consideration of the deficiency bill; but I desire to state that this resolution, I think, is in the precise words of one which has been adopted for years, and time after time, as the records of your own Senate will show, it has been regarded as a rule of the Senate for the session; and on various occasions within my recollection, though I cannot specify the times, when an important question has been before the Senate, a day's notice has been given preceding the Friday which they wanted to occupy, that they would move to rescind this rule for the day. I recollect distinctly that the Senator who preceded you, sir, from your own State, (Mr. Badger,) on one occasion, made that motion; and on the next day, Friday, we did rescind the rule for the day; but it was regarded as a rule of the Senate; a notice was given one day in advance, and it has been done frequently. This decision, therefore, is reversing the whole practice of the Senate ever since that rule was adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is obvious that we can reach our purpose without any reference to this rule. No one can ever control this Senate when a majority wishes to take up one class of business in preference to another. The majority must control its own business; and if a mere point as to the rule on the subject is suggested, what is to prevent us laying private bills on the table, one after another, as they are called, until we get through with them? We cannot make a rule by which the majority of the Senate will be prevented from doing the public business when it thinks the public exigency requires the dispensation of the rule. Nor can any previous arrangement do it. You can take these private bills and lay them upon the table, one after another; and when we have got through with them, then any public business is in order. It can be reached in that way; and I trust we shall not continue this profitless discussion; but, if there is, as I believe there is, a large majority of the Senate disposed to go on with the public business, let us go on with the deficiency bill.

Mr. STUART. I am unwilling that this question should be presented to the Senate, or pass away, under any misapprehension. I do not know but that there may be somebody here who objects to taking up the deficiency bill, but it is not I. I am entirely willing that the deficiency bill shall be taken up and acted upon to-day; but it is to avoid the very difficulty that is suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, that I do not like this question to pass off under the present decision. It may occur at the very next Friday that the whole day may be spent in a motion to postpone the private bills, and you may consume the entire Friday and do nothing. That we have seen here often, and it can be done any time. If the course suggested by the Senator of laying the private bills on the table were pursued, you might not get through with them all in two weeks, if the minority of the Senate saw fit to fight it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. STUART. But you can vote on a hundred propositions before you can get to it, by the yeas and nays; but that is not the point. It is in order that the business of the Senate may be under the control of the Senate, that I suggest that the uniform practice of the Senate should be followed; that by common consent we lay aside private bills to-day, and take up the deficiency bill; but not that we submit to a decision which would enable any Senator on any Friday to move to postpone the private bills to take up any question he wishes, and to debate it all day; that is the difficulty.

Now, sir, I referred to a case—the very case alluded to by the Senator from Maine—in 1854. Then, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Badger) wishing to get action upon the Kansas-Nebraska bill, gave one day's notice that he would move to set aside just such an order as this for Friday; and on Friday it was set aside without debate, the majority of the Senate being for it; but it has been always held that it required the unanimous consent of the Senate, under an order of this kind, to postpone private business.

It is said it is not a rule. You need not call a thing by the name of a rule in order that it should be a rule. It sets aside particular days for particular business. It is an order; it is a rule of your body that every Friday shall be appropriated in a particular manner; and it is as much a rule as it is that a bill shall not be read three times on the same day. A single objection carries it over; you cannot read the bill—a majority cannot have it read; it cannot be done at all. Why? Simply because the Senate has ordered otherwise. These rules are but orders of the Senate governing their action. Now, I am willing, and I hope the Senate will agree to lay aside all these questions for to-day, and take up the deficiency bill; but I hope they will not submit to a decision which will put it in the power of any member of the body to defeat a private bill any day when he chooses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark, though only temporarily occupying the chair, that he has some hesitation in deciding this question after the remarks made by Senators of more experience in the rules of this body. He does not profess to be experienced as to the uniform practice of the Senate on this question. The Chair entertained the opinion, and now entertains the opinion, that this resolution is, in substance, to be construed as though you had made private bills the special order for to-day. Suppose, instead of making the Private Calendar a special order, you had a resolution making half a dozen private bills on the table the special order for a particular day: it would be the order of business prescribed by the Senate. We make a special order to-day to be taken up to-morrow. It is in order for the Senate to take up the bill to-morrow; we have assigned that day to discuss that bill; but according to the uniform practice of the Senate, whenever that time comes, it is in order to move to postpone that, and take up something else.

Mr. STUART. It is so because the rule says so. The very rule which makes special orders says, "unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the Senate." If it did not say so, that could not be done. That is the very language of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the appeal—"Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Iverson, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

So the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Having voted with the majority, I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken; and I will state the reason for it. I was not in the Senate Chamber when the question arose, and I find that I stand on the record in opposition to a great majority of those—I do not know but that I am in opposition to the whole of those—with whom I uniformly vote on this floor, and I simply desire to make this justification. I understand the uniform practice of the Senate ever since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, without exception in my recollection, to be in accordance with the decision of the Chair. Having made that explanation, I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Briggs.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. FESSENDEN to strike out all after line thirty, page 2, of the printed bill, down to line one hundred and sixteen, page 6, and insert:

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1857, $279,377 57.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1857, $129,860 20.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1857, $751,487 15.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for barracks and quarters in the year ending June 30, 1857, $67,954 39.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $300,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations of incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $60,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1858, $2,000,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for constructing barracks, and other expenses incident to the same and to quarters for the troops, and to store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, during the year ending June 30, 1858, $30,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the purchase of horses necessary to be purchased in the year ending June 30, 1858, for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts, $100,000.

Mr. BELL. I should be very sorry indeed, Mr. President, if, by commencing my remarks at a late hour of the session yesterday, I prevented a vote on the passage of this bill then. My intention was to occupy the Senate but a few minutes, and to leave them, if they were prepared to vote without further debate. I wished to express, as briefly as I could, the grounds on which I proposed to sustain the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine; and I will now be as brief as possible. If I supposed the Senate was now ready to take the vote on the bill without further delay, I do not know but that I would rather dispense with any further remarks on the subject, considering that I have already expressed some of the heads of my objection to the bill as it now stands. I pledged myself that I had no desire to continue this debate; and if the Senate will indulge me for a few minutes, I will not trespass upon them longer, and the day may be appropriated, according to the rule, to the consideration of private business.

Mr. President, it is not so much the money that is appropriated by this bill that causes me to interpose any remarks of mine in relation to it. After that point has been disposed of, there is a far greater principle, a far greater interest, than the seven, or eight, or ten million dollars proposed to be voted by it. The difference between the bill as it stands, and what it will be if the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine shall be adopted, reducing the appropriations beyond this fiscal year about one half, is small indeed in amount compared to the principle which I think is connected with it. I stated yesterday that Congress had no mode of expressing its dissent, or of entering a protest against the exercise of the discretion which the Executive had assumed in instituting this expedition to Utah, and that I thought we ought to adopt some mode of expressing the sentiment of this House, the Senate of the United States, in opposition to such discretion hereafter by the Presidents of the United States. I said, in the first place, that I thought it was pretty clear that it was not proper for this body to express any sentiment that it had been done in violation of law. I would not affirm that now, even if it were not improper to do so; but I will state that, if there be any color of law for the exercise of such a discretion under the Constitution, it is one of the grossest abuses of such a discretion. Although it may be sanctioned by law, to some extent; although there may be some plausible ground for it, it is one of the grossest abuses that has ever taken place in the practice of the Government.

I occupied a few minutes yesterday evening in showing the extreme jealousy with which the power of using the Army and Navy of the United States had been conceded by Congress to the President, from the very foundation of the Government. It was guarded with such caution, that when he was authorized to call out the militia, or to exercise the power of executing the laws by the military, I think, by fair inference from the provisions of nearly all the laws on that subject, Congress never meant to extend it beyond the next meeting of Congress, and thirty days afterwards. In regard to using force to remove settlers from Indian lands, or even to carry into effect treaties, which are the supreme law of the land, the President never seems to have felt himself authorized to employ the military force for that purpose, without an express act of Congress. This shows how dangerous it has been considered to concede such a discretion heretofore in the practice of the Government.

But, Mr. President, it may be asked, what is the great danger that I consider involved in the exercise of such a discretion as this? Why, sir, it is the tendency to subvert the Constitution in one of its most important provisions. May I not appeal to honorable Senators from the South, who are so tenacious about the proper construction of the Constitution, who refuse to appropriate money for rivers and harbors, or internal improvements of any description, and who talk of the abuses of the Government in expending the millions appropriated for such unconstitutional objects? I have always said that the danger of abuses and excessive expenditures in this Government has arisen, and will always arise, in the exercise of powers clearly conceded—such as the war power. It is almost unlimited; and it appears, by the practice we are getting into, that it is impossible to fix any limit to this discretion that is exercised, in cases not like this, (for this is rather an extraordinary occasion,) but I think we ought to express our opinions decidedly against it. The great leak in the Treasury, I repeat again, is caused by the exercise of unlimited powers by the Executive Government not sufficiently controlled by Congress; and in many cases it seems impossible to control them.

What are to be the consequences of allowing this to pass without—I will not say censure—but without disapproval, or without any expression of opinion in regard to it? A President, we know, at one day in our history, and at no very late day, involved the country in a foreign war without consulting Congress, placed the country in such a position that her dignity and honor seemed to demand of Congress that they should recognize a declaration of war, made by the order of the President himself, in fact, though not in name. He did not make war expressly, but he did it by the movement of troops, just as in this case, in one respect, though that was on a larger scale. So Mr. Buchanan, or any other President who chooses to exercise power, can, at any time, involve us in a foreign war by the use of the Army and Navy, under circumstances not contemplated by the Constitution. The Mexican war was a successful one; it terminated gloriously for our arms; and it did not seem to be meet and fit that Congress should make it a point to condemn or censure in terms, either by resolution or in any other mode, the act of that President in bringing on the Mexican war. I will not call that an abuse of the discretion, but I call this an abuse of the discretion which seems to be conceded to the President over the Army and Navy of the United States. The law did not authorize him to do it—neither the act of 1795, nor of 1807, nor any other law, because the object sought to be attained, as I understand, is to execute the laws of the United States in Utah Territory. The act of 1807 authorized the President to use the regular Army in suppressing an obstruction to the execution of the laws of the United States in any Territory in cases similar to those where the act of 1795 authorized him to employ the militia. But the provision is express, that all the prerequisites prescribed by the law of 1795 must first be complied with.

One of the requisites of the act of 1795 was, that the President should be called on by the Legislature, or, if the Legislature could not be convened, by the Governor. No such preliminary steps, no such prerequisites were complied with in this case; and therefore it appears to have occurred to the President himself that he could not, according to law, order this expedition; and he puts it on the footing of a posse comitatus, substituted in the place of the regular posse of the county, or community, or Territory, in which the laws are obstructed. He assumes that the powers given to the marshal are not sufficient to prevent obstructions to the execution of the law. I understand that is the extent of the authority claimed, so far as I am able to infer from anything stated by the President himself. Everybody will see at once, that when the Governor was going through a wild country, through hostile tribes of Indians, or if he was going into a Territory where there was danger that he would meet with obstruction, a military escort would not be considered a violation of the discretion of the President in exercising the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. It would be proper in such a case to furnish an escort to his own officer to enable him to arrive safely at his destination, and be installed in power on the removal of one Governor who might have it in his power to incite opposition to the induction of the new officer into his seat. If information existed to show that such resistance was probable, the sending of a military escort would not be considered any abuse of discretion; on the contrary, it would be proper.

But for any other purpose he has no power to move what we may call a great army in this country. The force originally contemplated for the Utah expedition was three thousand; it was then reduced to twenty-five hundred, and that was supposed to be sufficient. Finally the movement was made with fifteen hundred rank and file of the Army besides attendants—I suppose a thousand others engaged in the transportation of baggage and subsistence. That cannot fairly be considered as furnishing a mere military escort, or a posse. If it is not making war, it is moving the Army in large numbers, and at the expense of a war establishment. Such a movement looks like an exercise of the war-making power, and not a mere execution of the laws in compliance with the constitutional duty of the President. That is the light in which it presents itself to my view. Not only that, but he contemplates stationing an army of five thousand six hundred men, besides the attendants that would naturally belong to an army of that size, and maintaining it for a year in Utah, and for three or four years longer for anything that you or I know. Why, sir, if these people choose to take refuge in the gorges of the mountains, and to evade coming in competition with the regular forces of the United States, when is this contest to end? It appears already that what has been expended, together with what is contemplated for the supplies of next year, amounts to six or seven million dollars. How of much that is an excess over the regular expenditures of the Army I do not know. I have not looked into that subject; but we see in this bill the extraordinary amount of the expenditure, the largest portion of which is extra. Look into the estimates and see the extravagant cost of transportation and of supplies furnished for the support of the army now in Utah. We do not know that the estimates are not small for them. It is in fact, if not making war, a violation of his duty by the exercise of his discretion, placing the country in a condition where war expenditures are necessarily thrown upon it; and I think some expression of opinion on this practice is due from Congress to prevent the exercise of such a discretion as this, supposing that he had a right under the law to exercise any discretion in relation to it.

What is the abuse, after all, it may be asked? Need I repeat again that, about the first month of the summer of the last year, this expedition was organized; but it did not actually set out from our frontier posts until nearly the last of September? There was not a man of any experience or sagacity, acquainted with the character of that region, and the difficulties, the dangers, the contingencies attending the march of such a force, who could have supposed that the army then starting would reach Utah during the year, unless it was an unusual season, and there was an absence of the ordinary rigors of winter? Besides, although the expedition may have been thought of by the President before the pressure in the monetary condition of the country was commenced, it was persisted in, notwithstanding he must have foreseen that the Treasury would soon be exhausted if it was persevered in, and the troops were not on their march until the very season of frost commenced—as soon as they reached the mountains, at all events.

Under all these difficulties the expedition was persevered in, and pressed forward. It may be asked, what is he to do? Is he not bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed? Yes, sir, he is; and there is an ordinary mode pointed out: the laws are to be executed by civil process, if it is in the power of the courts, through the marshal of the Territory, to serve it. If not, call out a posse. If the difficulty is too great for that, and the laws cannot still be executed, then, in a certain form, the Legislature of the Territory, or Governor of the Territory, may call on the President to furnish militia, or the regular Army, by the act of 1807, in order to execute the laws, where the obstruction is found to be too great for the civil power. None of these circumstances existed in this case. What laws of the United States have been violated, so far as we know, in Utah, up to this day? Where has the Government suffered? In what respect? What concern have we to have regular judges there, sitting and holding courts to do justice, to preserve order, to punish crimes, and preserve the peace of the country by the regular administration of justice? We have instituted courts among a people who settle everything by a religious fanatical organization, who apply to no courts. They do not desire them. Who are there that have lost any rights, that have not been duly protected, in consequence of the absence of those judges?

We have had no land system in operation there. We provided for a surveyor general; we proposed to survey the land, and establish a land office in that Territory; but it has never been done. How much do we suffer by that? What is the injury to the United States? I have heard it said that it is not becoming the dignity of a great Government like this to let these people disregard the provisions for their protection, or an administration of justice, which they care nothing about—I mean as to trial of causes between individuals. Our dignity or honor is not concerned in this respect at all. The people in Utah are an anomalous people in this country. Their condition is new. What is the true policy of this Government? To let them alone. By sending this army forward, you probably have perpetuated their absurd religious and social organization for ten, perhaps twenty years, longer than it would otherwise endure. They have lived by persecution from the first. There is not an intelligent man among them who will not say that the persecutions with which they have met in their former career have been a great source of their rapid multiplication. I am acquainted with a very modest and intelligent young man among them—I have not seen him for some time—as honest as any man, but on the verge of derangement, though still intelligent. There is a thin, paper-like wall between sanity and insanity in him, so that while you converse with him you cannot but have a certain sort of respect for his intellect and the flashings of his genius, which he exhibits even in animated conversation, much more in his public addresses. He admitted to me that they were indebted for their large increase to the persecutions they had endured, making martyrs of men, cementing and confirming their devotion to their absurd faith, he not admitting it to be absurd. You have, by this false movement, probably perpetuated the social system of that people within our boundaries for ten years at least. If you had let them alone, they would have dissolved in a few years by their own dissensions. The young man of whom I have spoken did not like the system of polygamy; it was hardly mooted when I conversed with him. He would not tolerate such a thing for a moment, and there are a large portion of them who do not adhere to the idea that it is a proper system.

Then, sir, you may ask, why ought the President to have appealed to Congress? That is the next point which I will make. It may be asked, what would we have to advise? It was his duty to appeal to Congress; to lay before Congress the difficulties that existed in Utah, and to ask their opinion and their action. He ought to have consulted the national Legislature as to what it was prudent to do. Those irregularities existed for two years before, though not perhaps to so great an extent; but to some extent. There was the same failure in the administration of law there, and there were no causes arising for adjudication by our judges. We could better have paid their salaries than pay for this expensive expedition. We should have advised him probably to let them alone. We might have advised that it would be inexpedient, under the circumstances, to persecute these people, or to do anything that they might consider to be persecution, and to establish non-intercourse with them, if you please; and to inhibit (if we thought proper to consider them in a state of rebellion against the United States authorities) the immigration of additional Mormons to strengthen them while in that Territory. We might have thought proper to institute negotiations to buy them off and send them out of our territory, by furnishing them the means to buy a new country, where they would be within no other jurisdiction than their own; for instance, on some island in the Pacific. We might come to an understanding by which our own emigrant trains, passing to California or to Oregon, should go peaceably. We might have provided a military escort, to some extent, to protect the emigrant trains. Any of these plans would have been better than to have incurred the enormous expenditure which we are likely to incur by having a war with these Mormons, who will undoubtedly consider it as religious persecution, and which will tend to establish them permanently somewhere, and link them together by new sympathies, by the recollection of common persecutions, for years and years beyond the time they would endure, if we had let them alone.

This would have been according to the practice of our Presidents heretofore. When it was proposed to nullify the laws of the United States in the State of South Carolina, did General Jackson dare to institute any military expedition on his own discretion and authority? South Carolina not only threatened resistance, but was actually organizing her forces, disciplining them regularly, providing arms and munitions of war, expressing the strongest determination that a people could express, to carry out their principles. And what did General Jackson do? He laid the case before Congress, asked their advice and opinion, and they passed a law which, although it was called the bloody bill at the time, was very mild in its provisions. The first great object was to secure the regular collection of the revenue, and then if there were obstructions to the execution of the laws of the United States in the State of South Carolina, it was provided that if any case of that sort should arise, and it should be notified to the President by an associate judge of the Supreme Court, or a judge of the district court, the President might use the same means that he was authorized to employ under the act of 1795, after complying with the prerequisites of that act. Then, again, that act was not permitted to be in existence more than a year. Congress, under all the excitement, and the determined spirit of the majority to have the laws executed, were not willing to trust even General Jackson with the exercise of unlimited discretion under the acts of 1795 and 1807, as revived, with some modification, in the act of 1833, for more than one year. They required the matter to come back for the revision of Congress, for the repeal or modification of the law at the end of a year.

Now, I should like to know whether this discretion that is exercised by the President would be a safe one in contingencies that it is not improbable may arise in the history of this country? Suppose California should decide to separate herself from the Union; suppose she should resist the laws of the United States, or offer such obstructions that they could not be carried into execution, either in regard to the minerals, or the public lands, or any other matter; or suppose she should decide, in convention or by her Legislature, that she would resist the authorities of the United States: would you be willing to leave it to the President at his discretion to order the Army and Navy, without consulting Congress, and to make contracts, under the discretionary powers of law which exist, for immense quantities of supplies of subsistence and arms? Take a case of less importance: suppose the Territory of Oregon should go off because we should not admit her into the Union as soon as she thought she was entitled to admission; or suppose the Territory of Washington should set up the standard of independence: would it be safe or proper to allow the President of the United States to institute military expeditions, without consulting Congress, and to make contracts, under the discretionary power which it seems to be necessary, to some extent, to vest in the War Department and quartermaster general's department, as they have exercised it in this case? Yet the principle asserted in this case would give that authority; and this precedent, if we allow it to pass without rebuke, would authorize him, in his own discretion, if an occurrence like that I have indicated should take place in the vacation between the two sessions of Congress, to institute a military expedition, to take the question into his own hands, and to place it in such an aspect that Congress could but second the policy, whatever it might be, that he chose to institute in regard to it. So, if the standard of opposition were erected in one of the States on the Atlantic coast, ought any President to dare, without calling Congress together, to make war upon that State, either to summon the militia of the neighboring States or use the regular Army, according to his ideas of what is expedient to be done for the honor and dignity of this great Government?

I think there are many gentlemen here who would revolt at the idea of allowing such a discretion to be vested in the President; and yet what is the difference between the exercise of his discretion in that case and the present? To a great extent, in principle, they are the same. It is a most dangerous power, not only in reference to the peace of the country, and the interests of the country generally, but more especially and particularly in reference to our frontier. Take the case of Utah, which lies at a distance of twelve hundred miles from your outposts. I believe a barrel of flour cannot be got there, including all the cost of transportation, for less than forty or fifty dollars. Will you allow the President to have the discretion of stationing an army of three or five thousand men in such a position? There might be points on the Rocky Mountains and on the Pacific coast where it would cost even more; where there would be greater extravagance in the prices of supplies of all kinds to maintain an army. These are abuses which we may expect to arise hereafter, if, without passing any opinion on this case, we vote what is demanded. If we enter no protest against such a discretion, we may expect all these consequences to arise hereafter.

Sir, I shall not go into any further details to show the necessity of the Senate expressing some opinion on this subject. I understand that the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine provides fully for all the deficiencies of the present year; and it only curtails the appropriations for supplying five thousand six hundred men in Utah for a year to come. I think we may well wait a month, until the end of the session, and see whether that will be necessary.

What restraints have we in making these contracts? The honorable Senator from Virginia says the contracts must be made, or the supplies cannot be furnished this year. That may be true to a certain extent; but they need not be made in the month of May or the month of June, for the late expedition was not started until nearly the last of September. If we appropriate now, in advance, the full amount of the moneys that it is considered may possibly be necessary to support the additional troops to be sent to Utah, what restraint is there upon the War Department or the quartermaster's department from making extravagant contracts, when you leave them the power to use their discretion anyhow, as seems to be conceded by most gentlemen, and contended for by the honorable Senator from Virginia? If you vote the seven or eight millions asked for now, that will cover between three and four million dollars for this year's deficiencies, and over three million dollars for the next year's service, upon an estimate made out by General Jesup, of the ultimatum of what will be demanded, supposing the troops sent out there will not amount to more than fifty-six hundred. Ought we not to keep something in reserve? Ought there not to be some check? The general depression of business has thrown a great many men here, seeking jobs and contracts under the Government, who would not appear here under ordinary circumstances. The vultures are all around us. They come to live, and get into some enterprise, some business, by which large profits can be made out of the Government. Here we have a quasi war, which affords them the opportunity; and we are about to vote all that is asked by the proper Department for the expenditures of the next year. Well, sir, will they not make the contracts for the full amounts? I shall detain the Senate no longer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the amendments offered by the honorable Senator from Maine meet my concurrence, and I shall give them my support, and unless those amendments are adopted, or substantially adopted, I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill. I shall not detain the Senate by giving my reasons for doing so, at length; but I desire in a single word, to say, I once supposed that the power both of the sword and the purse in this Government was in Congress; that although the President was Commander-in-Chief, and controlled and used the sword, when it was drawn by Congress, I still had always supposed that Congress alone gave the word when to draw it; that the war-making power was in Congress, and Congress alone, and that, in this respect, we had made a great advance upon the monarchical Governments of the Old World. But, sir, it was said the other day by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] upon the floor of the Senate, and I am compelled, with reluctance, to admit that, perhaps, what he said was true:

"It is useless to disguise that although the war-making power is given by the Constitution to Congress, any President can so conduct our foreign relations that Congress will have but to choose the alternative of sustaining him or disgracing the country in the eyes of the world."

No one better understands, or more truly represents the views of the present Administration here than that Senator.

So that, in truth, so far as war with foreign nations is concerned, if this declaration of his be true—and I do not know but that it has come to be true—the war-making power is really, substantially, in the hands of the Executive. As against foreign Governments the sword, therefore, is his.

How is it in relation to any domestic wars? Under a specious pretense, a new contrivance of modern growth, the Army of the United States, for all domestic purposes, has become a mere posse comitatus—yes, sir, a posse comitatus; and as such the President of the United States claims the absolute, unlimited power to send the whole Army of the United States from one end of our domain to the other. It is as a posse comitatus that he has sent them to Utah, and so he states in his message.

"I appointed a new Governor and other Federal officers for Utah, and sent them with a military force for their protection and to aid as a posse comitatus in case of need in the execution of the laws."

Under this specious pretense that the Army of the United States is a posse comitatus, complete control is in his hands, or assumed to be in his hands, over the Army of the United States; and the power of the sword, therefore, in reference to all our domestic affairs is in the hands of the President, and not in the hands of Congress.

Now, sir, where is the power over the purse? I understand it is claimed that while in every other Department of the Government no contracts can be entered into for the expenditure of money, unless the money has been specifically appropriated by Congress for a specific object, that in the quartermaster-general's department—that is to say, in relation to all those matters which are necessary to sustain the Army, to contract for the purchase of arms and supplies, and for the transportation of troops, it is all within the power of the President without any special act of Congress; and that contracts may be entered into, binding upon the Government, binding upon its good faith, without any act of Congress, to an unlimited amount. It is assumed, too—and that is the very power which has been exercised since this Congress convened—that during the session of Congress, contracts may be entered into involving millions upon millions of dollars; contracts which are to run for a period of more than two years, in violation of the spirit, if not of the express words, of the Constitution; and that, too, while Congress is in actual session, and without the advice of Congress. If it be not an illegal assumption of power, is it not a dangerous abuse of power?

Sir, put these three things together: the one, as stated by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, that in our foreign relations the President has the power to involve us in war whether Congress is willing or not; the other, that our whole Army may be ordered from one end of the Union to the other, as a mere posse comitatus, in all domestic operations; and add this third and more dangerous of all others, the unlimited power of entering into contracts for the support of the Army and Navy, and where are we? Why, sir, the sword and the purse both are substantially in the hands of the President.

For one, I desire to protest against sanctioning the assumption and exercise of this power by the Executive, by voting for these enormous appropriations which are to run on through a period of years. Sir, where are we tending? I repeat the question of the honorable Senator who sits by me, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] whether do we tend? Where are we now? Are we at Washington or are we at St. Petersburg? Are we on the banks of the Potomac or on the banks of the Seine? Is this all that remains to Congress, simply to register the decrees which are necessary to carry on the foreign and domestic wars, and to carry out the contracts the Executive has made to furnish supplies and transportation to the Army and Navy? If it were not too serious a subject, would it not excite a smile to think that the whole Army of the United States has become a mere posse comitatus to be sent all over the United States? Why, sir, what an abuse of terms! A posse comitatus—the power of a county well understood and defined by all who are accustomed to legal proceedings—the civil power of the country which may be summoned by a sheriff in the execution of a process, but not a man of whom can be taken beyond the line of his bailiwick.

One word in relation to this controversy with the Mormons. In my humble opinion, the best mode of disposing of that controversy is to conquer them by civilization; is to conquer them by opening organized immigration into the Territories which surround them, and when you can place around them a population whose institutions and whose notions of social life and Christianity are such that they can sustain a republican form of government there, in opposition to the Mormons. You now send out your judges and Governors to administer laws among them. But, sir, how can you sustain a system of jurisprudence there when all the people are Mormons? How can you administer the laws when all your jurors are Mormons? There is the difficulty.

I shall not detain the Senate. I could have hoped that the Government of the United States, instead of incurring this vast amount of expenditure, might have induced them to leave the territories of the United States. I would rather have purchased for them an island in the Pacific ocean, in the neighborhood of those countries where their peculiar institutions meet with more favor, where polygamy is a common institution, and induced them to go there, and at the same time have opened the Territory of Utah to emigration, by defending the emigrant route to the Territory, building good wagon roads, inducing people to go there, and donating lands liberally to those who would settle there. But, Mr. President, I have already occupied more time than I intended. I shall vote heartily for the amendments proposed by the honorable Senator from Maine; and, I repeat, unless those amendments are substantially adopted, I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill.

Mr. STUART. I wish to submit a few words on this amendment, because the vote that I shall give upon the bill will be governed entirely by the result of the vote on this proposition, or some similar one. As I understand it, the bill, as it stands, contains an appropriation for the subsistence of the Army, which runs to the close of the fiscal year 1860; that is, two years from the 1st of July next.

Mr. HUNTER. Twenty months from the 1st day of July next.

Mr. STUART. From the 30th of June, 1858, to the 30th of June, 1860, is certainly two years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me a moment. The bill, as it stands, does not appropriate for any particular time at all. These estimates make no part of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I understand that distinction; but I say there is embraced in this bill now, an appropriation which has been estimated for by the War Department, which estimate is for the subsistence of the Army to the 30th day of June, 1860, that is, two years from the 30th day of June next.

Mr. HUNTER. Here it is: "this estimate is necessary to purchase, in advance, for twenty months' subsistence for the troops composing the army for Utah." The items are given: "one year's supply, three hundred and sixty-five days; eight months' supply," &c.

Mr. STUART. I have looked at this question. This estimate is certainly not very clear; but when you turn to the note, the note to the whole is this.

"This estimate is necessary to purchase, in advance, for twenty months' subsistence for the troops composing the army for Utah, that quantity being required to go forward with the troops. It is not an additional estimate, as stores are to supply that portion of the Army during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, and for part of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860."

Mr. HUNTER. Part of it—eight months of it.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir, a part of it; but the appropriation runs through that year. There can be no two opinions about that. If you make an appropriation for the expenses of the first part of the year, is the Senator prepared to say that you cannot use that during the whole fiscal year?

Mr. HUNTER. Oh, no. This appropriation does not differ from any other. The Senator is speaking of the estimates. If it were not for the estimate, he could not say this differed from anything else. The estimate is not for two years, but for twenty months. This can be used like all other appropriations. There is no difference between them.

Mr. STUART. There can be no difference of opinion as to the facts in this case. What the War Department talks about here, is a twenty months' purchase; it asks for money to enable the Department to purchase twenty months in advance. That is quite another thing. But I say that here is money appropriated in this bill, and if it be appropriated, it is in the power of the Department, under this law, to use it from this time to the 30th of June, 1860. There can be no dispute about that. It is true the officer says it is to enable him to purchase twenty months in advance, but he tells you that the estimates are for the years 1859 and 1860.

Mr. HUNTER. Cannot they use all the appropriations in this bill for two years from the fiscal year? Does this differ from any of the others?

Mr. STUART. I will tell the Senator the difference. The difference rests in this: that while we have a general law which does not carry these appropriations to the surplus fund until the end of two years, we have a constitutional provision against appropriating money directly for the Army for more than two years. We cannot make an appropriation to-day, under the Constitution, to support the Army, to be applied longer than two years from the day the law passes. We are expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. It is no answer to that to say that after the end of this fiscal year it will be two years before that appropriation goes to the surplus fund, if not expended. That does not answer the constitutional objection. The constitutional objection that I make to this bill is, that in this bill to be voted upon to-day, there is an appropriation directly, which extends beyond two years from the date of passing the bill, and so far as the Senate are concerned, the bill is passed when they vote on it; and I say that is not in the power of the Senate, under the Constitution.

Now, what is the argument for this? I do not think the reason any better than the principle. If anybody will take the estimate and the note that is appended to it, and undertake to give it a sensible explanation, he will undertake a gigantic task; but the argument is this, that the transportation to Utah can be made more advantageously between the 1st of May and the 1st of August than it can afterwards, and hence the Department asks us to appropriate money for more than two years in advance. As I said the other day, the 1st of May has not arrived yet, and this bill, in all human probability, will pass before the 1st of May, and therefore the transportation of this year can be taken advantage of. Now, before the next 1st of May we shall pass the general Army appropriation bill. We shall pass it at this session to commence on the 1st day of July, 1858, and to end the 1st day of July, 1859. That gives you all the advantage of the season commencing in May, 1859. If you want to make transportation for the army in Utah in May, 1859, you pass the bill for that purpose before this Congress adjourns. Then go to the 1st of May, 1860; the next session of Congress meets and adjourns two months before that.

I call the attention of Senators to this proposition; and as I said, the reason of the Department is no better than the principle. There is no reason in it. It is a mere specious pretense, that they want to avail themselves of the cheapest season for transportation. I say again, that you may wait until the next session of Congress and then make your appropriation for transportation in 1860, and if made at any time during the session, it will be two months in advance of the commencement of the transporting season. Then is there any necessity for this? Certainly none at all. We are told by the chairman of the committee that if we appropriate this $1,220,000 now, we shall not have to appropriate it in the general appropriation bill that may be in here next week; but my answer is, that in that general appropriation you have the clear constitutional authority, because the effect of that bill does not commence until the 1st of July next, and your appropriations, even if you make them for two years, are then within your constitutional authority, but in this bill they are not.

Now, Mr. President, why shall not this amendment, offered by the honorable Senator from Maine, prevail? It is not pretended that this money is wanted now; it is not pretended that the Department needs anything more than to avail itself of the necessary subsistence for this army for the next ensuing year, and all that is left in the bill, if the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Maine prevail. He has amended it as originally offered by adding $1,000,000, so that every necessary dollar remains provided for in this bill, if the amendment prevails. If it does not prevail, then there stands in this bill an appropriation of money to support the Army for more than two years from the passage of the bill, and in my opinion that is plainly unconstitutional. Therefore, I say, that unless the amendment prevails, I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Michigan manifestly misunderstands the appropriation. It is an appropriation like every other appropriation for the present fiscal year. It stands on the same footing with every other. The scheme is not to make an appropriation for two years ahead; for this more than for any other object, but it is to enable them to buy provisions for twenty months ahead. They might buy them all and send them forward this summer. The Senator does not mean to say that the troops shall not eat army bread if it is made out of flour more than two years old. The meaning of it is that they are to buy supplies, and they will probably all be bought within the next fiscal year, and sent forward in advance. As I understand it, this amendment of the Senator from Maine does not touch this particular matter; it is the quartermaster's department to which his amendment applies.

Mr. STUART. It is possible that I do not understand it; but from anything that has been said by the honorable Senator from Virginia, it seems to me that my argument stands. What evidence have we of the necessity of any appropriation at all? It is the estimate of the Department. Well, if the Department sends any estimate here, and says there is $1,220,000 of this money wanted, not for this year's expenditures, but for the subsistence of the Army in 1859 and 1860, I ask, where is your authority under the Constitution, to make an appropriation to-day to support an army during the fiscal year of 1860?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would ask the Senator from Michigan where he gets the constitutional power to found cannon, and buy balls, and provide supplies of powder, in time of peace, to be laid up for times of necessity hereafter? We make an appropriation from year to year for those objects. The proposition of the Senator from Virginia now is, that this is an appropriation to purchase certain supplies. The supplies may not be used for five years; they may be used in one year or two years; but the purchase is now to be made, the appropriation is now to be made use of, and if it is considered desirable to have in store a reservation of bread and biscuit, as much as cannon balls or anything else, nothing prevents us buying them this year under the Constitution, I respectfully suggest to the Senator.

Mr. STUART. That depends entirely upon the exigency of the case. It may be a necessity, and it may be an evasion. In the case the Senator puts, there is no appropriation of money not to be used this year; but I submit that it would be worse than an evasion for the Senate to say that there shall now be purchased and sent to Utah the subsistence necessary for the army in Utah for the next two years. You have no evidence that the difficulties will last six months; and shall you now purchase and throw into Utah, at an enormous expense of transportation, two years' subsistence for the army there? Not at all. I should be opposed to that on any ground of economy that could be named. What, sir; assume that there are to be ten or twenty thousand soldiers maintained in Utah during the next two years, and to send forward this spring the whole subsistence for them during that time! No man in his senses would do that. I agree that you may appropriate any amount of money that is actually to be used this year, according to your discretion; and if the Senator from Louisiana is ready to say that, in his judgment, the army will remain in Utah two years, and that he means to justify the War Department in sending forward this spring the necessary subsistence for those two years, then he ought to vote for this appropriation; but I do not agree to that. I believe, if that is the suggestion made, it is a mere evasion; but I say again, that if the Department means, what is now said for it, that it is intended to send two years' supplies this spring to Utah, then I am against it upon principles of economy, and I will not vote the money. So that, take either horn of the dilemma, I am against it. If it is now proposed to appropriate money to be used at the discretion of the Department during the coming two years and three months, then I say you have not the constitutional authority. If it is proposed now to buy and send to Utah two years and three months' provisions, then I am against it on the score of economy. In neither event am I willing to vote the money.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think there is some error in the argument of the Senator from Michigan in relation to this constitutional provision. The constitutional provision is this:

"The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years."

No appropriation of money for the purpose of raising and supporting armies shall be for a longer period than two years. Now, sir, I do not understand that that constitutional prohibition has ever been so applied as to prevent Congress from laying in stores or supplies; nor do I understand that there is any impropriety in forwarding your supplies to any point five years in advance, if you please, where you may suppose that the future exigencies of the Government may require those supplies to be placed. Are we not sending all the time armaments and munitions of war to California? Do we not put them in our fortifications? Do we not buy cannon? Do we not buy supplies for the Army every day? Do we not buy them in large masses? Is there any constitutional prohibition against that? It is not now proposed to raise and support armies by an appropriation of money for more than two years in advance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Does he contend that cannon and ball are supplies for the support of an army?

Mr. BENJAMIN. No, sir; not supplies for the support of an army. The Constitution does not speak of buying arms.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Read it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will read it:

"The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that cover the purchase of cannon and munitions of war?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I cannot understand how the Army is to be supported unless it is provided with arms and munitions of war. I do so understand it, unquestionably. I understand the prohibition of appropriating money for more than two years in advance, for the purpose of raising and supporting armies, to be a prohibition against the Congress of the United States exercising its power—its war-power of raising and supporting armies, by providing in advance for more than two years for maintaining and keeping up an army; but that the Congress of the United States is prohibited from purchasing military stores of any class whatever ten years in advance I never understood. I never supposed this prohibition of the Constitution applied to that. I have never before heard it suggested. On the contrary, this Government from the foundation has ever gone on the principle of accumulating all the necessary supplies, which in time of war are frequently dear, and are gathered with great cost—to make accumulations of all such supplies in time of peace to be ready for any sudden emergency.

I do not desire to detain the Senate by any continuation of this debate, but I must say that there have been some sentiments thrown out here that seem to me entirely unjust towards the Administration of the Government. I stand here as no peculiar supporter of the Administration; but, when I hear gentlemen complaining of an abuse of power—of the President's usurping the war-making power, and usurping the purse of the country, when Congress alone has control over the Army and the purse—I think they are entirely mistating the case. A few words as to the facts which have led to this expedition.

There is a community in the recesses of the Rocky Mountains, which has been organized by the Government of the United States into a Territory. By degrees, the peculiar religious tenets of this people have been developed until it is found that, so far from being capable of maintaining a republican form of government, their religious belief makes it necessary for them to yield implicit obedience to their priesthood—a form of religious belief evidently incompatible with the existence of republican institutions. This has been developed to its full extent only since the Territory was organized. I speak not of their peculiar institutions in relation to polygamy. However much we may reprehend them, in my judgment, it is a matter with which Congress has no concern; but we have concern with their opinions and principles, so far as they render impracticable a republican form of government. To that extent we are authorized to inquire into their institutions.

The Government of the United States has had its civil officers there for some years past; and within the last eighteen months, such facts have become developed as made it apparent that the civil officers of the Government were not safe in their persons or property, nor in the exercise of their duties and functions as vested in them by the law of the land. We know that civil and judicial officers of the Government have fled from that Territory, and have brought to the President of the United States complaints that they were unable to perform their duties under the law, because held in terror of loss of life by threats emanating from the fanatical portion of the Mormon people—possibly from their very priests who govern them. The Territory was without public officers. It was the duty of the President to provide them. We confirmed them. Now, the President sends out his officers under circumstances in which it has become apparent that they require some protection. What was his duty? Was it his duty to ask these officers to go there to be again driven away; to again come back to him with tales of violence, and threats of terror exercised over them? What would gentlemen all around me have said, if he had taken that course? They would have said that the President had been derelict in his duty. They would have said that the Constitution made him executor of the laws of his country. They would have said that the Constitution vested in him full power to use the Army and Navy of the United States as Commander-in-Chief; and that it was his duty, in the Territories governed under the laws of the United States, to give protection to the civil powers against lawless invasion. What, then, did the President do? Had he not a right to order troops to march from one part of the United States to the other? Was that a usurpation of the war power—the order to our troops to march upon our own Territory?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that the President states that they are ordered there as a posse comitatus.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Exactly. I am coming to that. The gentleman need not fear my shirking any part of the argument. I am not afraid of any part of it. The civil officers are ordered to Utah, and the President of the United States upon our territory orders our armies to march. Does he give instructions of hostility? Does he direct a blow to be stricken, or a shot to be fired? No, sir. He has been guilty of no usurpation. He has done naught but his duty. He has sent his civil officers there to perform their civil duties.

What next? Proof is brought to him that the wagons containing the supplies for the army have been waylaid, the teamsters attacked and driven off, and the public provisions of the country plundered by marauding bands of Mormons; or in other words, proof is brought to him of an actual commencement of hostility by persons owing allegiance to the Government. What was the President to do then? What was it his duty to do then? Was it his duty to leave our troops thus lawfully ordered into this distant Territory without supplies? Was not that the very case provided for in your law? Let me read another law that has not yet been referred to:

"The President of the United States be, and he is hereby empowered, as he may deem it expedient, either to appoint for the time being a special commissary or commissaries for the purpose of supplying by purchase or contract and of issuing, or to authorize any officer or officers in the quartermaster general's department to supply and issue as aforesaid the whole or any part of the subsistence of the Army in all cases, where either from the want of contractors or from any deficiency on their part, or from any other contingency, such measures as may be deemed proper and necessary in order to ensure the subsistence of the Army, or any part thereof."

Mr. POLK. What is the date of that, sir?

Mr. BENJAMIN. That law was passed in 1813. The subsequent laws I read yesterday. They organized a commissary general of purchases; they authorized the Secretary of War in all cases of exigency to direct purchases to be made without contract and without notice, and then all the powers that were by this act vested in the commissary general of purchases are, by a subsequent law, vested in the quartermaster's department.

With our troops there in a distant Territory, with attacks made on them, the President of the United States has deemed it his duty to contract for supplies and to forward them, as he was not only authorized to do, but as he was bound to do, in the execution of his duty to the country. Last spring nobody heard a word against the propriety of sending out a military escort to protect the civil officers of the Government when they were threatened. Nobody then pretended that it was a usurpation of governmental powers; and in all the public papers of the country, even those which represent the views of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who sit around me, I have never yet seen the power questioned on the part of the Executive to send protection to our civil officers into our own Territories, when they are attacked, when war is commenced by blind fanatics and insurgents, who themselves make incursions upon the supply trains of the Government. Was the President then to stop? Was he to let the supplies of the Government be plundered? Was he to call back the troops, or was he to back them himself? That was the question, and the only question, which he and his Cabinet had to decide. The troops were there; they were attacked by insurgents. A moment's hesitation, any indication of doubt or of withdrawal on the part of the President or his Cabinet, would have encouraged these men in their insurrection, would have encouraged them in the belief that they could back down the Government, as gentlemen propose that they shall now succeed in doing.

The President considered it to be his duty, and in that I fully approve his course, to send reinforcements to the army, to contract for supplies, to forward them in time, to assure the troops not only of the moral but of the material aid and support which in that distant country they had a right to expect from those charged with the administration of public affairs; and gentlemen represent this as usurpation of the war power—a usurpation of the purse. It is neither one nor the other. It is the discharge of a high executive duty, in seeing that the laws be faithfully executed, and in protecting the proper officers of the Government with its military force, in protecting its civil officers against invasion, onslaught, and perhaps murder, by these people in Utah, who seem to regard themselves as sole sovereigns of the whole interior of this continent, to defy and deride the power of this Government.

Under these circumstances, I cannot hesitate to back the Government. It is a public duty, which I should think myself derelict to every principle of duty in not carrying out to its fullest extent. I think that this is not a time to examine very closely into estimates of this character. The Government requires aid. We are informed that our army there requires supplies, and that those supplies must be forwarded now. Let us undertake reform when we come to the general appropriation bills, not at this moment, when these appropriations are so urgently required by the public service.

I am sorry to have detained the Senate; I did not mean to say a word; but I have been urged to what I have said by the remarks of gentlemen around me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I take it, sir, that we live under a constitutional Government; that the powers of the Executive are limited and defined; that he possesses all the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the country, and the laws of the land in subordination to that Constitution. It is very easy for gentlemen to rise here and say that it is the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and that he has the right to use the Army as he pleases; but he has no such right, unless it is conferred upon him by the law. The Senator from Louisiana tells us that he has the right to send the Army as an escort to civil officers. If he has that right, the law gives it. He refers to no such statute.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Why, Mr. President, I will ask of the Senator from Illinois who is to post the Army—who is to order it from point to point? Does Congress do it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Congress makes provision how the Army shall be used, and the President of the United States is the Commander-in-Chief to carry out the directions of Congress. He cannot use the Army in his discretion because he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Did I not refer to the statute yesterday, and show that as long ago as 1793 the Congress of the United States, by a specific act, gave the President power even to garrison a fort? When they authorized the building of a fort at Charleston and at New York, they thought it necessary to confer, by specific grant, power upon the President to put a garrison there.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question? and if he answers that in the negative, I shall give up all argument with him. I ask him again if he contends that the President of the United States has not power to post the Army in the absence of any special direction by Congress, or if Congress is to order the march of the Army from post to post?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not contend, sir, that the President may not change the Army by virtue of his power as Commander-in-Chief, so that he does it within the law. If the law raises a regiment of mounted men to protect the frontiers of Texas, the President may move those troops as he pleases upon the frontiers of Texas, so as to protect them; but I deny that the President can take that regiment raised by the authority of Congress to protect the frontiers of Texas and station them in a fort at New York.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator will permit me to say that is not the point. He has jumped from the Army to one regiment that Congress has raised specially for Texas. I ask him, in regard to the general Army of the country, if the President has not the right to post any portion of it that he thinks proper in Salt Lake City, if he chooses?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not. I think he has not the right to post the Army in Salt Lake City. It would be a great abuse of power to do that without the direction of Congress, because Congress has directed how the Army shall be used. It has authorized the President, under certain circumstances, to use a certain portion of the Army to protect the Indians in their reservations, to protect the frontier against Indian incursions; and I say that the President must use it in that way; and if he were to withdraw the whole Army from that service, and station it at Salt Lake City, or any other point, it would be a violation of his duty, and it would be without authority of law.

But the Senator from Louisiana begs the question. What is it? The question is, whether the President of the United States has authority to use the Army as a posse comitatus to accompany a civil officer to one of the Territories? That is a specific matter; but no such power is given in any act of Congress. He may use the Army within the limits of the law. If a fort is constructed on the northwestern frontier, or in Texas, or in Salt Lake City, and the President is directed to garrison the forts, or if he is directed to use the Army in protecting the western settlers against the border Indians, he may use it in that way; but what I mean to say is, that his authority in the use of the Army is as much limited as it is in other respects.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator one other question, then: I will suppose that the President is informed that a descent is about to be made—an attack on San Francisco by some foreign nation. Has the President power to order the troops to concentrate at San Francisco? and if so, where does he get his power?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have already stated that the President can use the Army within the limits of the law, and the Senator puts a case directly provided for—the case of invasion. The act of 1795, in the very case, the gentleman puts, authorizes the President of the United States, on the application of the Legislature of California, or, if the Legislature cannot be convened, on the application of the Governor of California, to order the Army there to protect San Francisco; and the very fact that Congress has provided by an act, that the President may use the Army in this way, shows that without this special act he had no such authority. But for this act of Congress I would answer gentlemen, no; the President has no authority to order the Army to San Francisco to protect it against invasion, except under this act of Congress.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand the gentleman, then, to say this distinctly—I only want his proposition to be fairly before the Senate and the country—that, if the President of the United States has intelligence of an intended attack upon us anywhere, he cannot order the troops there to be ready to repel the attack, if the Legislature or Governor who happens to have authority over the point that he knows to be threatened does not send and ask him to do it; and if we had news to-morrow that there was a squadron on the way to attack California, the President must remain with his arms folded, according to the gentleman's interpretation of his constitutional power; and could not send a soldier there until the Legislature or Governor of that State sends and asks him to do it. If that is the gentleman's interpretation of the law and the Constitution, of course he has a perfect right to entertain it. I merely say I cannot agree with him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I mean to say he cannot enter the State of California and make use of the Army there, unless in obedience to the law, and in the mode that the law has pointed out. If it were not so, there would be no use for the law. If the President can protect a State against invasion without complying with this act of Congress, will the Senator state for what purpose this act was passed? Why was this act of Congress enacted, declaring that in case a State was invaded, the President might, on application of the executive authority or the Legislature, use the Army to protect it against invasion, if he had that power without the law? I take it, that the President of the United States has no authority to march the Army into any State or Territory in this Union, and commence a war. That he has some power over the Army of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief, and has power which Congress cannot take from him, as Commander-in-Chief, to control and direct the Army within the law, I do not deny. But here is a use of the Army that is not provided for by any act of Congress; and inasmuch as the powers of the President are limited, as he can exercise no authority except by virtue of the Constitution and laws of the country, I ask for the authority of the President to send an army as an escort to a civil officer—I use the gentleman's language. If he has that authority, he has it by virtue of the Constitution or law. If he can show neither Constitution nor law, he has not got it. It will not do to say that he has it under his general power to see that the laws are faithfully executed. I imagine that the Senator from Louisiana will hardly contend that that confers a specific power. He will hardly insist that under the general grant of authority to see that the laws are faithfully executed, the President has any specific powers granted him which he can exercise except in the mode pointed out by law. It is very much like the clause of the Constitution of the United States which states that it was framed to promote the general welfare. Does any one contend that that confers any specific power upon the Government created by the Constitution? That is not the object of it; and here it is the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed in the mode and manner that Congress prescribes.

The Senator from Wisconsin has referred me to the act of 1795, specifically conferring upon the President the power in the very case which the Senator from Louisiana puts. I will read it for the Senator's information, if he will listen to me, to show him that it is by virtue of a specific act of Congress that the President can act in the very case he puts:

"That, whenever the United States shall be invaded or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger"—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Militia?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, militia; and I will satisfy the gentleman about that in a moment—

"call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper."

Here is the identical power given to the President to call forth the militia, by this act of 1795, and by the act passed in 1807, which is familiar to the Senator, as it has been quoted here in this very debate half a dozen times, authority is conferred upon the President of the United States to use the Army and Navy in all cases where he had been previously authorized to make use of the militia; so that he may, in such a case as the Senator puts, summon the Army to San Francisco. It seems that he may do it before a call is made on him by the Legislature, which I supposed before to be necessary; but he does it in pursuance of this act of Congress. Congress believed it necessary to confer this power, or else they never would have conferred it. There is a total absence of any power to summon the Army under the absurd idea that it is a posse comitatus, as an escort to civil officers.

What a perversion of terms, what a misnomer, to compare this to the power which a civil officer may call to his assistance in a county to enable him to execute a writ! He may call the body of the county around him to assist him in the execution of the process of a court. He may summon the neighborhood, the vicinity. To say that that power confers upon the President of the United States authority to summon an army more than three thousand miles distant, from Florida to Utah, as a posse comitatus, for any purpose under heaven, is absurd. The Governor has no business with a posse comitatus. For no purpose that can be imagined has he authority to use one; and yet that is called a posse comitatus. It is under that pretense that the army was sent along with Governor Cumming; and under a mere pretense it was kept in Kansas for a year or more at very great expense; and if you will look into the items of this appropriation bill, I have no doubt you will find that a large portion of this deficiency has its origin in the unauthorized use of the army in Kansas during the last year.

As I am on my feet, I wish to say one word in reply to what was said by the Senator from Virginia. He said this bill made no appropriation that he was aware of for paying a deficiency occasioned by contracts made without authority of law; and the Senator from Louisiana came to his relief, and referred to a law of 1818, which he thinks authorized the Secretary of War, under certain circumstances, to make contracts without advertisement. I will not now comment upon that statute. It is somewhat equivocal in its character; and it is doubtful, to say the least, whether the construction put upon it by the Senator from Louisiana be correct; but, if it be, here is another section in this bill, under the miscellaneous head:

"For surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incident to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, being the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000 for that period, $220,000."

Is there any law for that?

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. When I spoke, that item escaped me. That contract was not authorized by the Department; it was made by the officer in California, and much of it originated in a mistake. The work was piece-work. It turned out to be more than was required; and he supposed there was a larger sum at the disposal of the Department than there was for that purpose, and he over-estimated. It is true there was no authority for that; but then the authority was exceeded through mistake by the officer; and, notwithstanding that, as I understand it, the President refused to reappoint him, because he had thus exceeded his authority. There was an excess of authority, I admit; but it originated in a mistake.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is admitted, I understand, that here is one provision in this bill appropriating $220,000 to pay a debt incurred without authority of law. About that there is no dispute; but it is said the officer who incurred this debt has not been reappointed. True, sir, not in California; but I understand he has been appointed surveyor general of Utah.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator will allow me to say it is no debt unless we choose to assume it. If we pass this bill, we assume it. It is addressed to our discretion whether we will pay it or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The chairman of the Finance Committee recommends us to assume it.

Mr. HUNTER. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He acknowledges it as a debt; and so far from the officer who contracted this debt meeting with the disapprobation of the Government, it seems he has been merely transferred from one office to another, from one appointment to another. It is suggested near me, that having created all the debt which he conveniently could create in California, he has been transferred to a new scene of action, in order, I suppose, to transcend his authority a second time.

Mr. GWIN. The gentleman did not accept the office, and has no office at all now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was tendered to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If he has not accepted it, it does not change the responsibility of the Administration. They appointed him, and if he has not accepted it they are entitled to no credit, for they have shown that they were willing, after an officer had run the Government in debt, as is now admitted, without authority of law, for more than two hundred thousand dollars in the matter of surveys, (for this is a vast sum when you consider the subject-matter to which it relates,) to offer him another appointment. It seems, however, that he felt ashamed, if I am to draw the inference from what the Senator from California says, after having done this, to accept a second office, and has not taken it.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Illinois has referred to the section of the bill which I intended to move to strike out yesterday, but I was notified by the Chair that my motion would not then be in order. The Senator from Virginia has not given a correct explanation. In the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is the explanation of the surveyor general of California, quoted in his own words. He says:

"The amount of the work embraced in the contracts existing previously to my last report, as well as the few that have been let since, was not, as a general thing, limited, as a more prudent course may probably have indicated."

So that there was no mistake committed, it would seem from the explanation given by the surveyor general himself. But he goes on to say:

"Indeed, in a measure, a more liberal course of contracting than would, under other and more favorable circumstances, have been adopted by not designating the number of miles to be surveyed under each contract."

So it would seem that these contracts have been made without indicating the amount of work to be done. The surveyor general then goes on to say:

"For the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1857, I asked for an appropriation for surveying public lands and private land claims, over and above the balances as aforesaid, then on hand, of $150,000."

The amount appropriated was $50,000, leaving balance of estimates, over and above the amount appropriated, of $100,000; but the amount expended over the appropriation is $220,000, thus exceeding his own estimates $120,000, and exceeding the appropriation made by Congress $220,000, making the expenditures of that year $270,000, instead of $50,000, as provided by Congress for this item. But, Mr. President, this is only the deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857. The surveyor general goes on to state:

"For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858" which is the fiscal year now about to expire—

"the amount asked for was $350,000. The amount appropriated was $100,000."

Thus leaving a balance of estimates amounting to $250,000 over and above the sum appropriated by Congress for the year ending 30th of June, 1858. Now, the deficiencies for this year (1853) have not been provided for in the appropriation bill before us; but the excess of money expended by the surveyor general, of $220,000 over and above the appropriations made by Congress, is for the single year ending June 30, 1857, an amount exceeding his own estimates nearly one hundred per cent.; and if the amount expended for the year 1858 should exceed his own estimates in the same ratio, you will be called on, perhaps before the adjournment of the present Congress, to appropriate an additional $500,000 to cover the deficiencies for the year 1858. That this will probably be the case, would seem almost inevitable, from the fact that these contracts are not limited in amount. The surveyor general says that the number of miles contracted for has not been specified, so that these contracts are still running. Men have been employed to survey the public lands, at, I believe, twenty-five dollars a mile ad libitum, without any restraint whatever. The surveyor general goes on to state that there are $350,000 estimated for these two years, over and above the amount appropriated, or, to use his own words,

"Between the amount estimated as necessary to carry on the surveying operations in California and the amount which Congress deemed it proper to appropriate."

He then says:

"The liberal appropriations that had been made in previous years by Congress for the same service induced the belief that the same policy was to be continued."

So it would seem, from the language of the surveyor general himself, that there was no mistake as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, but the officer was induced to believe that Congress would appropriate money to cover this enormous expenditure over and above the amount appropriated, because Congress had previously been liberal in appropriating money to cover deficiencies of this kind. He says:

"Consequently more work has been accomplished than under existing circumstances should have been."

"The only evils resulting therefrom, are, in the first place, a departure, on my part unintentionally, from the policy of the Government."

Thus, clearly admitting that there was no mistake, that he departed from the policy of the Government, and made this enormous expenditure of money on the belief that Congress would pursue the liberal policy which it had previously pursued. I might say, generally, here, that I had supposed, until very recently, that the officers of this Government were to be controlled by the amount of money appropriated by Congress in contracts made by them; and I was confirmed in this opinion, even in relation to Army contracts, from the message sent here by the President of the United States at an extra session of Congress. It may be remembered, by members of the Senate, that Congress was convened by the President in extra session but a very short time since. In the message of the President of the United States to Congress, thus convened, he stated, as a reason for reconvening Congress, that it had failed to pass one of the usual appropriation bills for the support of the Army, and thus induced Congress and the country to believe that the operations of the Army would, for the current year, necessarily be suspended for the want of an appropriation. But the Senator from Louisiana, to-day, seems to take a different view. He seems to think that there is no necessity for an appropriation of money by Congress as a guide to officers of the Army in making their contracts for supplies; even yielding the question of the power of the President, as Commander-in-Chief, to march an army to Utah, or to any other point within the limits of the United States, or without its limits.

I suppose the real and vital question to be determined now by Congress is, whether the President of the United States has a right to use money for this purpose, which Congress has refused to appropriate, or whether he has a right to go beyond the amount which was given by the Congress of the United States to be used in this way, at least, without the excuse of a contingency not previously contemplated, an exigency arising during the recess of Congress, or not contemplated when in session. If there was some great public necessity for making a contract of this kind, I suppose Congress would justify the usurpation of power just as an inferior officer in the Army might be justified in disobeying the orders of a superior. He would have the right to disobey the order of his superior at his peril, risking on his part the approval of his superior thereafter, or an acquittal by a court-martial. I suppose that an officer making contracts for the Government, might, under a pressing necessity, risk the approval of Congress in making a contract beyond the amount of money appropriated; but it seems to me to be dangerous policy to provide for these wholesale contracts, made without authority of law, and in the absence of a pressing public necessity.

It has not been pretended during this debate that any such pressing public necessity has arisen. There has no new state of facts arisen since the adjournment of Congress; and, in fact, it has been stated that contracts covering a large part of the gross sum appropriated by this bill, have been made since Congress convened at the commencement of this session, and whilst the President has had the opportunity to consult the wishes of the representatives of the people and of the States. Yet, without a word or intimation; without appropriations; without authority of the national Legislature, he has proceeded to make enormous contracts, requiring an expenditure of seven or eight millions of money.

It is a question, as I before remarked, whether this policy on the part of the Government shall be sanctioned in the absence of a public pressing necessity by which it may be justified. I know not whether these contracts have been wisely or unwisely made. It is impossible for me, with the limited knowledge I possess on this subject, to sift this appropriation bill so as to ascertain what work has been contracted for, and what supplies have been purchased that the absolute wants of the Army required. It is general and indefinite. But this item is specific and in glaring violation of law; and it has been passed over in silence by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PUGH. What item is that?

Mr. HARLAN. For surveys of public lands in California. I am willing, as an individual, to vote all the money that the absolute wants of the Government may require, and whenever a pressing necessity arises requiring expenditures of money for the preservation of the peace of the country, for the purpose of repelling an invasion, for the purpose of securing the execution of the law, I am willing to justify the President and his subordinates in exceeding an appropriation, should this occur during a recess of Congress. But I am unwilling to justify, by a vote of mine, this unnecessary use of power on the part of the Executive of this Government, when he has ample and full opportunity to consult the wishes of Congress. If we are to do this, if we are to justify this unauthorized expenditure of money, and the policy of the President of the United States in sending an army to Utah as a posse, and the policy of the judicial officers of the Government on their way to Utah, the President of the United States may annihilate the government of Virginia, or the government of the State of Iowa, in a single month. As I understand from the newspapers of the country, the judges, now accompanying the army in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, have already authorized the indictment of Brigham Young for treason. There, within the limits of that encampment, a grand jury has been impaneled, a court has been called, and bills of indictment have been authorized charging Young and others with high treason against the United States. If this policy is to be tolerated, the Governor of Virginia may be indicted to-morrow. Would there be any difficulty in finding a sufficient number of mere camp followers within the limits of an army encamped in a desert plain, or within the gorges of a barren mountain, who would obey the behests of a military commander? If this can be done in relation to Utah, and receive the solemn approval of the Senate of the United States, the same may be done with the Governor of Iowa to-morrow, or the Governor of Illinois, or the Governor of any State of this Union, at the mere caprice of the President.

As I before remarked, I am not willing to vote for a single dollar in this bill, which has not been authorized by law, which may not seem to me to have been justified by a pressing public necessity. When the general appropriation bills come up, I shall judge of the future necessities of the Government, and control my vote accordingly.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to occupy any time, sir, but simply to state my position here. As I apprehend this amendment will not be adopted, and my vote for it—as I shall vote for it—in that contingency, might by some people be construed into a vote for the supplies contemplated by the amendment, I wish to say that I shall vote for it, and if it is adopted, I shall vote against the bill. As there is no probability that it will be adopted, my vote, without this explanation, might stand as an expression of willingness on our part to vote the supplies contemplated by the amendment. I prefer the amendment to the original bill, but I shall vote against it, whether it is amended or not.

I was not in when my friend from Iowa commenced his remarks; but before the vote is taken on this bill, I shall endeavor to bring the sense of the Senate to their judgment of the necessity of other officers observing the law, even if we let the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy off, because it appears by this deficiency bill that there was appropriated, for the surveys of land in California, $50,000; and we are called upon to appropriate $220,000 besides, being, as the bill says, "the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000, up to that period."

It seems to be conceded, that by the operation of the act of the 1st of May, 1820, and by the exigencies of the service in the War and Navy Departments, those Secretaries have a right to contract without law and without appropriation. I shall take the sense of the Senate about the application of that doctrine to the surveyor general of a land district, to see whether, under an appropriation of $50,000, he has a right to incur "liabilities" (for that is the very term used in the bill) to the amount of $220,000 beyond the $50,000 appropriated; but as that is not before the Senate now, I shall not occupy time on it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to say something in relation to this matter of the California surveyor. The gentlemen who sit behind me are mistaken entirely in relation to the facts. I will state them as I understand them in a very few words. Congress had been for several years previously making large appropriations for surveys in California. The surveyor general sent his estimate for this service, to which gentlemen have alluded. Congress determined to reduce the quantity of survey made each year in California, and appropriated only $50,000 for that year; but California is far off; the appropriations are not made till June; the surveyor general imprudently (as he himself admits) employed his sub-surveyors to go on with the surveying in the State without telling them to stop their surveys at a certain number of miles. They surveyed greatly more than the appropriation would permit; greatly more than he supposed they would. He admits his error. He says it was done unintentionally. The Administration, knowing the fact, discharged him from his office; but, satisfied that it was unintentional, after giving that mark of disapprobation, tendered him another office with a view of showing a disapprobation of his conduct in undertaking to make these contracts without previous appropriations, but at the same time declining to fix upon him the stigma of any reprobation for what was simply imprudent.

Now, sir, what does the bill propose to do? The Administration do not propose to pay any money out of the Treasury to anybody; do not propose particularly to pay this gentleman any money. The Administration propose nothing but this: the deputy surveyors have done their work; their bills amount to this much; they do not bind the Government; nobody pretends that they do; the officer had no authority to make the contracts; and the question is now, as the work has been done for the Government, will Congress pay or not? It is left to our discretion. We are not bound to pay. There is equity and justice in the claim of these subalterns in my judgment, and I will vote for it. Senators around are not bound to vote for it. There is no pledge of Government faith for it. If they do not consider the appeal to equity sufficient for it, they will not vote for it. The Administration do not pretend that it binds the Government. It is no act of theirs; but a subordinate officer at a distance has exceeded his authority. They tell us so; but at the same time they say "this work has been done for the Government, and we think these sub-surveyors ought to be paid for it; the Government got the benefit of it, and we will pay if you please." Surely gentlemen cannot attack the Administration on such grounds as that; or if that be the best ground they can find it is a fortunate Administration.

Mr. HARLAN. I would reply to the Senator from Louisiana, that I merely desire him to regulate his conduct in relation to this appropriation as he proposes to do, and did do, I think, in relation to the appropriation asked by the Clerk of the House of Representatives. He told us then that he was willing to examine the claim of the Clerk as a private claim, and put the witnesses on oath before a committee of the Senate; and, if he ascertained that he had paid out money, and became satisfied that he was entitled to relief as a private claimant, then he would vote for all the money necessary to discharge that liability, as I understood him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Exactly.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire that this surveyor general and his deputies, having been employed without authority of law, shall be placed in precisely the same category; that they shall come before Congress as parties without legal claim for money, and present their equity; and, after we shall have become satisfied ourselves that the work was done, and that they have an equity to the money, let us do to them as we do to other private claimants, but not justify this violation of law by including this amount of money in the general appropriation bill to cover deficiencies which are presupposed to have been authorized by law. This is all I ask of the Senator from Louisiana, and all I ask of the Senate; and I may as well state now, as at any future time, that, if I shall hereafter become satisfied that this work has been done, and well done, and at fair prices, I, in common, I doubt not, with a majority of the members of the Senate, if not all of them, will vote the money necessary to pay it; but I am not willing to justify this general policy of the Government in making contracts without the authority of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GWIN. The charge that has been made against the surveyor general of California, of having violated the law in making these contracts, I think is not justified by the facts. As the Senator from Louisiana has stated, the policy of the Government was to make large appropriations—$300,000 a year—for surveying the public lands in California. There were one hundred and twenty millions acres of land in that State, and all of it was public land, with the exception of five or six million acres which were covered by private claims. As there were hundreds of thousands of persons in the State who had no land, it was desirable to bring the land into the market as early as possible in order to locate emigrants who had no homes to live upon, and who, owing to the unsettled state of private land claims, could not get land to which there was a perfect title. Hence the surveys were pressed forward with great rapidity. The Senator from Iowa states that these contracts were made at an extravagant price—twenty-five dollars a mile. He is entirely mistaken. The law limits the price to fifteen or sixteen dollars a mile. He did not go beyond the law.

The policy of the Government in surveying large quantities of land having been established, and the deputy surveyors having contracts looking to this amount that was annually appropriated, $300,000, the surveyor general confined them, as he supposed, within his estimate, but they were not made by the mile, because they had to be made from township to township. It was in an unexplored country. Their contracts were made to certain natural boundaries. The surveyor general had the making of a contract to such a river, and it was estimated to be such a distance, and subsequently, when the surveys were made, it was ascertained to be a greater distance. Hence the contracts could not be limited, owing to the want of knowledge of the geography of the country. It was in that great unexplored region called the Colorado basin, that an immense number of these surveys were made, and it was utterly impossible for the surveyor general, in making contracts, to ascertain the exact distance.

It was never intended, directly or indirectly, by the surveyor general or deputy surveyors, to exceed the appropriations made by law; and when the estimates for $150,000 were made, it was supposed, from the want of geographical knowledge which was absolutely necessary and indispensable to a correct estimate, that the amount which would be expended that year, with what was on hand, would not exceed $150,000. When the appropriation was brought down to $50,000 by Congress, the bill was passed in August, and the surveyors were then in the field, hundreds of miles from the surveyor general's office, with no mail communication, in a wild country, without communication for weeks and months, and the work was nearly all done before the surveyor general could apprise them of the fact that the appropriation had been diminished; and when he made the estimate, he was entirely ignorant of the number of miles the distances would be. He had to make his contracts to run from township lines to township lines, and including whole regions of country, in order that they might be sectionized. It was not until the deputy surveyors came in that it was ascertained the amount of their contracts exceeded what was estimated at first, and what was intended. He never intended to exceed the appropriations a dollar.

The Senator from Iowa asks for the deficiency of this year. There is not a deficiency of a dollar, not a cent, and nobody pretends that there is, for the present year. He intimates that there were deficiencies of former years, and because Congress had made liberal appropriations to meet those deficiencies, this surveyor general went on in violation of law, and contracted for an amount larger than was appropriated. There never has been a deficiency of a dollar besides that now before us. A large amount of this deficiency was created in another way. There was a certain percentage retained off the contracts of the surveyors—I believe twelve and a half or fifteen per cent. In order to press the survey of private land claims in California, a large number of which were dismissed in 1856, this percentage that was retained from the old contractors was used, supposing that the appropriations of Congress would be sufficient to cover the reserved amount due to contractors for surveying the public lands. It was used in surveying private lands. It amounted to nearly forty thousand dollars. That was money due to the contractors, used when it was not supposed, by the deputy surveyors or the surveyor general, that there was any deficiency; and the reduction of the appropriation was not known for months after it was made, and nearly six months of the fiscal year had expired before they ever heard at all of what the amount of the appropriation was.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the work done, there has been, since the service commenced—and it is only a few years—upwards of twenty-three million acres of public lands surveyed, sectionized, now ready to be brought into market; and there is now advertised, and will be during this year, for sale in that State, thirteen million acres of land; and when these sales take place, millions of dollars will be paid into the Treasury on account of these very surveys. There is no pretense on the part of anybody, that these deputy surveyors have not faithfully performed their duties. It is well known that the surveyors do not stop on the 1st of July; but theirs are continuous contracts from year to year. Whether the surveyor general had authority to make such contracts, in anticipation, or in expectation of appropriations to be made by Congress, is a question to be decided by the Senate. There was no intention to do wrong. The letter read by the Senator from Iowa shows that it was entirely unintentional on his part; and the reason given is, that he could not ascertain the distances between the various points it was desirable to survey in order to bring lands into market.

There is no pretext that the surveyor general intended to violate the law. It is very natural that such a mistake should arise in an unexplored country, where the officer had to suppose the distance between certain points. These surveys were, to some extent, in a part of the State where very few had traveled. The public policy was to bring large bodies of land into market in California, where there was such an immense quantity of public land, and so little in the hands of private individuals. All these things being considered, it was thought in California that not the slightest blame attached to anybody in connection with this matter. The reduction of the appropriation was unlooked for and unexpected. California is very distant from here, and it was some time before the reduction in the appropriation was known. The surveyor general is one of the most correct and honorable men ever known in the country—a man whose name is historical; and he deserves no censure on account of his having, from the great distance he was from the seat of Government, necessarily been ignorant for a long time of what the legislation of Congress was. It was upwards of three months after the fiscal year commenced before he knew what the action of Congress was. There was no man in that State who supposed he violated the law, or attached blame to him.

Besides, the work has been done. The Commissioner of the General Land Office so reports, and he recommends payment of this amount because it has been well done. The public lands have been surveyed. There was no intention to create a deficiency. There is no deficiency for the present fiscal year; for the very moment it was ascertained that there was likely to be a shortness of appropriation, instructions were given, and they have rigidly confined all contracts to the appropriations. The Senator says the contracts are running. The instructions were to confine all contracts to the amount appropriated; and it has been done.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from California also evades the very point at issue: that is, whether an officer of this Government has the right to go on without authority of Congress and make contracts. He states that these contracts were made before the people in California had heard what amount of money had been appropriated; that is to say, in advance of the knowledge of the appropriation of a single dollar, they made these contracts. That makes the case just $50,000 worse than it was before. I had supposed they had known of the appropriation of $50,000, and had exceeded that appropriation $220,000; but it appears from the explanation of the Senator from California, that, without any knowledge on that subject whatever, they made contracts amounting to $270,000, which makes the case more glaring than I had supposed it to be.

Mr. GWIN. The contracts reach from year to year. The same deputy surveyors have had contracts running four or five years; they never ceased working. There was always an estimate of how much they would expend within each fiscal year; and the deficiency that originated in the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1857, originated from a mistake in that unsettled country in making the estimates of what the distance would be from point to point. It turned out to be more than was supposed; but the contracts ran on from year to year. In every instance, except this year, the expenditure was limited to the exact amount appropriated by Congress. It is an expensive process to fit out a surveying expedition. It costs many thousands of dollars. They could not limit their contracts to the exact amount appropriated. It was also estimated how much would be needed within each fiscal year; and they progressed with their work after the 1st of July as they had before, never doubting—nor did the surveyor general doubt—that the appropriation of Congress would cover all the work that was required to be done.

Mr. HARLAN. This only makes the case more glaringly wrong; but I had stated this feature of the case in quoting the language of the surveyor general. He says that his contracts are generally without limit. The Senator from California now says they were not limited in time; and the surveyor general says they were not limited in amount; and we are now informed they run from year to year, and Congress is called upon to make this appropriation, and thus sanction that policy, and pay the bill. I am inclined to think the Senator from California cannot inform the Senate what these contracts are now. In the report of the surveyor general for the present year, which is before me, it is stated that they were made without limit; and we are now informed that they run from year to year, being without limit either as to amount or as to time.

This is a very plain case to a man who is somewhat conversant with the practical operation of our surveys. When deputies contract with the Government to survey lands, they agree to survey a certain number of townships, or sections, or to run certain base or correction lines. The error originated, doubtless, as the Senator says, in a desire on the part of the officers to hasten the surveys; but what I object to is, that it has been done without authority of law. And what I demand of the Senate is, to know whether this violation of law, so fiercely condemned yesterday, when the item in this same appropriation bill awarding money to the Clerk of the House of Representatives was under discussion, shall be approved. It was said, I think by the Senator from Louisiana, why did not the Clerk wait until he knew the money could be drawn from the Treasury, before he paid out money to his subordinates; why did he not draw on the Treasury of the United States for the amount, and after he had received the money disburse it, and not presume that Congress would, in violation of law, award the money to him which he had illegally expended? I repeat the same argument to-day: why did not the surveyor general of California wait until the money had been appropriated, and until he knew it was at his disposal?

This is the course pursued by the surveyors general in the districts with which I am acquainted. You appropriate $100,000 with which to prosecute surveys of lands in Iowa, or Minnesota, or Wisconsin, and the surveyor general of that district will limit his contracts specifically within the amount of appropriation, and if a deputy applies for a contract under him after the amount of money has been reached which has been appropriated by Congress, he is denied, and properly denied, work. So it ought to have been, and ought to be now, in California, and so, as I humbly conceive, it ought to be in supplying provisions for the Army of the United States. When the officer of the Government on whom this duty devolves has contracted for supplies to the amount of the appropriations, he has fulfilled his whole duty. When informed of this fact, if, in his opinion, the safety or efficiency of the Army requires an additional expenditure of money, it is his duty to inform Congress of the public necessity requiring additional appropriations of money; and if refused by Congress, to restrict the operations of the Army within the necessary limits. Should the public interests suffer, the responsibility would then be with the representatives of the people and of the States. The President would be discharged from blame.

I had supposed that this was the theory of our Government, that Congress held the purse strings, and that although the Executive did hold the sword, Congress could control the Executive, and thus control the Army and Navy by the amount of money appropriated for their support. But it would seem from the doctrine advanced here to-day, and by the oldest and ablest Senators too, I am sorry to say, that the Executive may go on ad libitum, that his own view of public policy or the public interests are to control Congress in determining the amount of money to be expended, and not the views of Congress to control by law the policy of the President.

I have only referred to this California case as perhaps a striking illustration of the character of the contracts, for the payment of which this immense amount of money is demanded. If the President may go on without authority of Congress, through his subordinates, and contract a debt of nearly ten million dollars, I inquire if he may not of one hundred million dollars? If it is mere matter for his discretion and not the discretion of Congress, I should like to know the limit beyond which the Executive shall not pass. I am told by the honorable Senator from Louisiana that we are under no obligation in law to pay this money. Well, if not, I am not willing to pay it until I know personally that the work has been done, by an investigation to be had here before a committee of this body, as he proposed in another case, as before stated.

And I will go still further with the Senator, and withhold other appropriations in this bill. Let a committee be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers; let a thorough examination of the public necessity for these enormous expenditures be had before a committee of this Senate; and if justified by such necessity, assume the debt thus created. But I fear, sir, that a critical examination of the whole subject will show some of these Army contracts to be as reckless and unjustifiable as the California land-surveying contracts; that they are practically without limit as to amount and as to time. I notice one in the paper sent here by the Secretary of War—a contract for beef cattle—for three thousand five hundred beeves, to be delivered in Salt Lake, and ten thousand more if the wants of the army shall require it; three thousand five hundred to be delivered now, and ten thousand more if the wants of the army shall require it, at the same rates. I would inquire of the Senate, whether Congress has authorized this unlimited contract for beef? When did Congress authorize this immense expenditure of money? Calculating, however, as did the surveyor general of California, that the same liberal policy hitherto pursued would again be followed out, the contracts have been made, and you are called on now to foot the bill for three thousand five hundred beeves, and will in time, doubtless, for the remaining ten thousand; and that, too, without authority of Congress, and, so far as I am informed, without a public necessity justifying this assumption of power on the part of the President. None can be pleaded, as Congress has been in session during the period in which this immense expenditure has been made.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator says there is nothing in the papers to indicate that the making of contracts to an amount exceeding the appropriations is not now going on. I have already told the Senate that now there is no deficiency, that there is no contract which is permitted to exceed the appropriations for the present fiscal year, and that the surveyor general has been peremptorily instructed, and was, when he was appointed, to limit all his contracts and all his expenditures to the appropriation for the year, and to create no deficiencies whatever. He has solicited his expenditures, and no man can truthfully say otherwise. As to these running contracts, they were necessary, on account of the nature of the country to be surveyed. The distances were not known. They had to be estimated. The contracts could not be given out there, as in Iowa, for so many townships and so many sections; but they were between such and such points, as between the San Bernardino mountain and the Colorado river, estimated to be a certain distance; but when it was surveyed there were more townships and more sections than were originally supposed. It was never intended to exceed the appropriation made by law.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a privileged question. It is for the purpose of making a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Kansas bill.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire of the Senator as to a fact. If I understand the case correctly, I shall object to the report. I ask the Senator if the bill on which he proposes to make his report is in the Senate, or in the House of Representatives. If the bill is in the House, I make the point that the Senator cannot report without the bill. The parliamentary law is, that the House agreeing to the conference has possession of the bill and the accompanying papers. That House, in this case, is the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON in the chair.) The Chair is under the impression that although a privileged question, still, as there is a bill before the Senate, this report cannot be received until that bill be disposed of in some way by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I apprehend there is no objection to what I propose to do. The object is simply to present the report, and make it the special order for a certain time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair of course will receive it by general consent.

Mr. STUART. I object.

Mr. HUNTER. I apprehend that it is the privilege of a conference committee to report at any time.

Mr. GREEN. And to ask for the consideration of the report at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that while a question is pending before the Senate, and under actual debate, that subject can be interrupted, except by a vote of the Senate. The 11th rule of the Senate prescribes that—

“When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, to postpone indefinitely, to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or amend.”

The only motion there that is extrinsic of the subject under debate is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GREEN. Rather than raise any question of order, I move to lay the subject now before us on the table for the purpose of allowing me to make my report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, I make the point, that inasmuch as the bill on which the Senator proposes to make his report is with the House of Representatives, and has not been returned here, there is no subject before the Senate on which he can make the report.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to that we have a practice of our own. It will be found that our practice as to committees of conference does not square exactly with that laid down in the Manual; and, in point of fact, I believe we are entitled to the papers, if we choose to demand them. The Senate asked the conference; and, according to my recollection, the House asking the conference, is entitled to the papers.

Mr. GREEN. I propose to make a report. The Senator from Michigan raises a point of order, on the ground that I have not got the bill. He does not know whether I have got it or not. He asked me the question, and did not wait for me to answer. Now, I intend to answer, and my answer is this: the report will show whether I have got the bill or not. I rise to a privileged question, which, under parliamentary law, entitles me to the floor and to be heard; and when my report is made, if it be not in proper form, the Senate can take the proper course upon it; and when my report is presented it will show whether I have the bill or not.

But I go further than that. If, when the report is read, it should be found that I have not the House bill, or the Senate bill, I will give a reason for it, which, under parliamentary law, is satisfactory and legal. The bill cannot be in the possession of both Houses at the same time. Yet when a joint committee of conference come to an agreement, each branch of the committee has a right to report instantly before either House acts upon it. You cannot divide the bill; you cannot tear it into pieces, and take a part to the House of Representatives, and part to the Senate. It cannot be ubiquitous. It must be in the one or the other; and yet both have the parliamentary right to act; and on what do they act, when we come to the reason of the thing? They do not act upon the bill; they act upon the report. They do not act upon the House amendment; they act upon the report. Each House knows its own proceedings. The Senate knows what bill it proposed to pass. The House of Representatives knows what it proposed to pass. The report of the joint committee of conference is the subject-matter for the action of the two Houses, but not the bill. You cannot go back, and strike at the bill. You cannot even go back and propose to amend the bill. The bill is not under consideration; and hence I claim the right to report to the Senate the result of the deliberations of the joint committee of conference. When the report is made, if it be deficient in not having the bill, the Senator's point of order will be time enough; but he cannot know in advance what I have in my hand; nor do I deem it my duty to inform him. He ought to raise points of order upon what he knows; not upon what he does not know.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, so far as the Senator advises me, I am much obliged to him. Now I do know that he has not got the bill.

Mr. GREEN. You do not.

Mr. STUART. The Senator may talk about what he knows. I do know—

Mr. GREEN. Why did you ask me the question, then?

Mr. STUART. I do know that the bill is before the House of Representatives at this time. Now, the Senator asks me, and it is a very proper question, why I inquired of him whether he had the bill. I did it because it was parliamentary and respectful to him as a Senator. That is the reason; and if he would treat me and the Senate upon the same principle, he would save a great many of the hard words he uses.

Now, let us look at what is the practical effect. One House or the other must have the control of a bill, so that when it is finally acted upon they may transmit it to the Executive for his approval or disapproval; and hence there is no action in either House upon a bill unless the bill is before it. Take this case: the Manual says that the House agreeing to the conference has possession of the bill. What follows? The committee of the House having possession of the bill makes its report of what the committee of conference has agreed upon. The vote of the House is taken. If that House agrees to its report, it orders its Clerk to send a message to the Senate, informing the Senate that the House has agreed to the report of the committee of conference, and they transmit that information with the bill to the Senate. Then the Senate committee reports and calls for the action of the Senate upon the bill. If the Senate also agrees to the report of the conference, what is the effect? The Senator thinks the Senate does not vote upon the bill. Technically speaking, that is true; but they vote upon a report which passes the bill; and being then in the possession of the Senate, the Senate instructs its officers to transmit that bill to the Executive, it having passed both Houses, according to parliamentary law, although the bill itself, by itself, never passed either House. That is true; but we all understand the parliamentary law, and here, then, is the practical effect: when you have the bill you vote upon the report; you receive the report and act upon it, or postpone it to any day you please for action; but until you have the bill here, you have nothing to act upon. Now, sir, suppose—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the honorable Senator that the Chair can know nothing of what is contained in the report, nor can the Chair be informed from anything that takes place in the debate. The Chair takes it for granted that the chairman of the committee proposes to make a report; and if the Senate is prepared to receive the report, it must be made. If there be any objections to it afterwards, they can be presented after the Senate receives the report; but, in the judgment of the Chair, it is a question for the Senate, not a point of order.

Mr. STUART. I was coming to that point. The Senator from Missouri says that he refuses to tell the President and the Senate whether he has got the bill or not, but insists on reporting as a privileged question. Now, sir, unless he has got the bill there is no privileged question; and I object therefore to his right to report. He has no right to report.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Does he say that our committee cannot report because they have not the bill in their possession?

Mr. STUART. I do.

Mr. PUGH. There are twenty precedents, I think, since I have been a member of the Senate. I recollect one case in the last session of the last Congress, where the Senate conferees came back, and made a written report themselves to the Senate, and signed it; I was one of them, and they had not the bill in their possession at all.

Mr. STUART. I suppose I can refer the Senator to a thousand, or two thousand, or ten thousand cases, where a bill has been read three times and passed on the same day. Why was it done? Because there was no objection to it—that is the reason. In this case I see fit to make the objection, and require that the parliamentary law shall be complied with; and without the bill, I object to the report, and there is no right to make it.

I was stating that the Senator cannot, by refusing to say whether he has got the bill or not, make his report as a privileged question, and thus put it beyond the power of the Senate to object to it. My objection is to the reception of the report, to the motion that he makes as a privileged motion because he has not the bill, and without it he has not got a privileged motion. The bill is in the House of Representatives, and may never come away from there. Then what is the action of the Senate for? Suppose we should spend the remainder of the session here in discussing the question of whether we will agree to the report or not; we have not got the bill and cannot get it; and if the other House never comes to a determinate conclusion upon it, we never can get it; what earthly consequence is it what is the opinion of the Senate on this subject?

The Chair will see, then, that the point I make is one to which there is no answer. I agree with the Senator from Ohio (and it is stated by the Senator from Virginia also) that this is often done at the last days of a session; we receive reports in both Houses; we read bills three times on one day; we do anything by common consent that will facilitate business; we do it without objection; but if the parliamentary law means anything when it says that the House agreeing to the conference retains the papers, it means that the first action is by the House which retains the papers. Until they have acted decidedly upon it, and inform us of the result, and send the papers to us, we cannot act.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator will allow me to suggest to him that there seems to be an obscurity in the case which he presents to the Senate. He asks the chairman of the committee on conference whether he has the bill; and seems to assume that the propriety of receiving the report depends upon the fact whether the chairman of the committee of conference has it or not. Now, it seems to me that one House or the other is in possession of this bill, by parliamentary law and in point of fact. It cannot be between the two Houses, in the rotunda; it cannot be with the chairman of the committee of each House. One House has got it, and the other has not got it; and it cannot have got out of the possession of the right House into any person's hand, or the hand of any chairman, so as to withdraw it from the possession of that House. I do not know which of these two Houses this bill belongs to at this stage of the business. I do not know, as a practical question, who has it—whether the Senate has it, and whether it is in the hands of the Senate's portion of the committee of conference, or whether the House of Representatives has it, and it is in the possession, constructively, of the House, but in fact, for the use of the conference, in the hands of the chairman. But it is in one place or the other, to be acted upon, legislatively, by the proper House.

Now, the honorable Senator ought to know, for he is very well skilled in these points of order, whether the Senate has got the bill or whether it has not. If the chairman has it, he has it not at all for this purpose, unless he has it as a trustee or agent of the Senate, and to return it again to the Senate. So in regard to the other House. It is very clear that we must have the bill before receiving the report, because the Senate is presumed not to know what the report is. If the report of the committee should be that the Senate should recede from its position, then the bill will be passed, as I understand, as it came from the House; and it will be the identical bill which the House passed, and it is a vote on the bill.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator from New York will allow me a moment, I think I will satisfy him and the Senate that what I said is true. I said I did know that the Senator making this motion had not the bill. I alluded to what I know as a parliamentary fact, that the whole Senate knows; and let me tell you why. The parliamentary law says that the House agreeing to the conference has the possession of the papers when the conference breaks up. That I know as matter of law; that you know, Mr. President, as presiding officer of this body. That is the law which governs conferences; and the presumption is that this conference committee has acted agreeably to the law. Now, until the Clerk of the House of Representatives announces to you in the ordinary parliamentary mode that he returns that bill to the Senate, you know as the presiding officer of this body, I know as a Senator of the body, and all the Senate know, that it is not here, and that the Senator from Missouri has not got it.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. BIGGS. Suppose, as in this case, an amendment, sent to us from the House of Representatives to a bill originating in this body, is disagreed to by the Senate. Suppose a committee of conference is raised by the two Houses, and the committee agree to recommend that the Senate recede from its amendment. Then the only thing to be acted upon is, whether the Senate will agree to recede. Then, I ask, whether, or not, the Senate committee, under those circumstances, could report, and have that action of the Senate by which the bill would be passed, without having any notice from the House of Representatives? It may be, in this case, for aught I know, that that may be the report. In a case of that kind, there would be no action to be had upon the bill, except the action of the Senate receding from their amendment, and then the bill would be passed.

Now, sir, in that case, according to the idea of the Senator from Michigan, it would be necessary, when the joint committee reports in the House of Representatives, for that body to do something, though they were not asked by the joint committee of conference to do anything, and though that committee only asked the Senate to recede from their amendment. There must be action, therefore, according to the Senator from Michigan, by the House of Representatives—upon what? Upon nothing recommended by the committee of conference, because they have not to recede; but the action must be by the Senate. According to his notion, in that case, until there was a report to the House, and the House agreed to the report, which report was that the Senate should recede, and it came back here, the Senate never could act upon this report of the committee of conference. It seems to me that that position is not maintainable.

Mr. STUART. I think I can answer my friend from North Carolina in a moment.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to permit me to say a word?

Mr. STUART. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator from Michigan is now mistaken. I understand that the bill is on the desk of the Senator from Missouri. I am informed that it has been surreptitiously taken from the House of Representatives and placed upon the desk of the Senator from Missouri within the last four minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield the floor to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRODERICK. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to ask the Senator from California whether he intimates, directly or indirectly, that I had any agency in surreptitiously getting it upon my table.

Mr. BRODERICK. I will explain to the Senator. I have been informed by a very distinguished member of the other House that this bill was surreptitiously taken from that House and placed upon the desk of the Senator from Missouri. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri had any knowledge of the fact before it was placed on his desk. That is my explanation. My informant is a gentleman well known to this body.

Mr. STUART. I would rather not get up any collateral question at all, because, as I said, I intend to stand upon what we all know. The Senator from Missouri refused to make a statement, and I was arguing upon what we know as Senators, upon the principle that every man knows the law. In reply to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I would say that in the case he puts, as in all other cases, the report of the committee of conference is voted upon, and the question of receding is not voted upon at all, even in the Senate. It is a question in each and every case upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference. If the committee come to the conclusion suggested by him, that the Senate should recede from their disagreement, the question is not on receding, but on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, and in that case the committee reports with the bill to the House of Representatives, because the committee of that House, as I said before, has the papers. The committee report that they have agreed that the Senate shall recede from its disagreement. The question put is, will the House agree to this report? If the House vote that they will, then the Clerk comes here with the bill, and announces at the door of the Senate that the House has agreed to the report of the committee of conference, and that accordingly he returns the bill here. The question then is not, will the Senate recede from their amendment, but, will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference, and the report is unamendable. If we were brought to the question whether we should recede, we could agree to the amendment of the House with an amendment, and so prolong the controversy. The vote, however, is upon the report of the committee, and that alone.

Now, sir, I do not care where this bill is in point of fact. If it has been surreptitiously taken from the House of Representatives, and brought here to answer a supposed exigency, that does not alter my point. I am talking about where this bill is in point of parliamentary law. I say that, by parliamentary law, this bill is in the House of Representatives until the Clerk of that House announces to us in session that he has returned it here with the action of the House upon the report of the committee of conference; and, until that comes, there can be no report to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) As the Chair understands the case, the point made by the Senator from Michigan cannot be received as a question of order, but is a matter for the determination of the Senate, if any question be made. The bill was in the possession of the Senate when the Senate received a message informing them that the House of Representatives had agreed to the conference. The bill, therefore, was last in the possession of the Senate, the Senate having asked the conference, and the House of Representatives agreeing to it. When the committee of conference met, the presumption is that the bill and any other papers connected with it, were taken to the conference by the committee of the Senate; because the bill was certainly last in the possession of the Senate. Now, although it may be a rule of parliamentary law that, after the conference ends the papers are to be left in the hands of the committee of the House asking the conference, the Chair cannot know whether that has been complied with. The Chair, therefore, would respectfully suggest to the Senator making the objection, that the more proper form would be that the committee should make their report; and, if he finds in the report any objectionable matter, let it be brought before the Senate whether it shall be received. That is the impression of the Chair, submitted with great deference.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to the papers, I find that the law of the Manual is as stated by the Senator from Michigan, that the papers are with the House agreeing to the conference. The papers must be presumed to be where by law they ought to be. No matter where they are in point of fact, the papers must be presumed to be where by law they ought to be; and if they were lying on my table, when by law they ought to be in the House of Representatives, of course we should treat them as if they were where the law presumed them to be. But the ground upon which we ask the Senate to consider the report is upon the practice of the Senate itself. I say, and the Senator from Michigan acknowledges, that the occasions have been frequent where either body has acted upon the report of a conference committee without having the papers with it. It is upon that question of our own practice that we stand. As to the question of where the papers are, I believe, myself, they ought to be considered as being on the table of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. I differ from my friend from Virginia. I do not understand the parliamentary law as he does, and I think that an examination of it will show that both the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Michigan are mistaken.

The law says that the House asking the conference must have possession of the papers. That is an invariable rule of law. In this case the Senate asked the conference and had possession of the papers; and, in asking the conference, you need not transmit the papers to the other House with the request to meet you in conference. There is, therefore, no presumption that the House acceding to the request for a conference has ever had possession of the papers from the time the request was made. I have seen no parliamentary law justifying any such assertion. But, even if it were so, does that affect the real point now under consideration? Is there any information legally here (for, if we are on legal points, we must adhere to them strictly) that the papers have ever been sent to the other House? The House has never informed us that it has possession of those papers; no communication has been made to the Senate to that effect; but when the Senator from Michigan asks me the question whether I have possession of them, he implies either that he does not know it, or, if he does know, he is asking a question upon a point on which he wants no information.

I propose to make a report on a privileged question. When the Senate shall have received that report, it is for the Senate to act or not act, according to the circumstances which then surround the question. If the Senate cannot act in the absence of the bill, and if the Secretary has not possession of the bill, and if also I should fail to report the bill, that will stay action, but it cannot stay my report. My report is the result of the conference of the committee. It is no part of the bill. The action of the Senate, after the report is made, may depend or may not depend upon the possession of the bill; but the right to make the report is not contingent on that fact. Nor will I answer the question. I stand upon my rights. I deny the right of the Senator from Michigan to ask me whether or not I have possession of the Senate bill, or of the House amendment, or of any of the papers pertaining to this case. I have a right to make that report. I am prepared to make that report. It is a privileged question. When that report is made, it is for the Senate to say whether they are authorized to act upon the subject-matter or not.

It may be that the Senate may then say, "we do not choose to act on it." It may be that the Senate may decide, "we ought to have the bill before us, and the Secretary has it not." That is a subsequent matter; but it is not a matter to be inquired into before the exercise of any prerogative can take place. Mine is a privileged motion. How could it be a privileged question to make a report from a conference committee, if you never could make it until the other House inform you that they have acted on it? The absurdity of it is proved by the single fact: if the Senate can never report on this subject until the House shall have first acted and shall inform us of the result of that action, and send the bill to us, then my privilege to make a report from the committee of conference is not a privileged question. It would be a question dependent upon the other House; and yet there is not a single parliamentarian from the year one down to the present time, even including the very astute and distinguished Senator from Michigan, who does not admit that the right to make the report is a privileged question.

If the Senate be not otherwise engaged on any other subject, it is my right to make the report; it is the Senate's right to decide what action they will take upon that report; and if there be material facts not in the possession of the Senate, they will not act. If there be important papers, essential to a proper consideration of the subject, they will prejudice no man's right by acting in their absence. But the privilege of the committee of conference to make a report, as a privileged question, is not dependent upon the action of the House of Representatives. Are we to be crushed to the earth because the House of Representatives may not choose to act? Is a parliamentary right conceded to all legislative bodies to make, as a privileged question, a report from a committee on conference, to be destroyed and taken away, because the coordinate branch does not choose to act upon the subject?

Such is not the parliamentary law. The parliamentary law gives equal rights; equal privileges. When these committees met they were just equal, and when they agreed they were just equal; and what does equality mean? That only one can report? No, sir, that both may report; both Houses may act, and if they concur in their action it is an agreement between the two Houses of Congress, and it becomes binding, subject only to the approval of the Executive. If neither one can report without the other one has acted, they are not equal, and their equality would all be destroyed. No matter what decisions may have been made on this point, the common practice of this Government is of more force, because there is more common sense attached to it; it is for the interest of the country; it can prejudice no man's rights. I hold, therefore, that the Senate ought to sustain the right of the committee of conference to make their report, and then to act on it, or not to act on it, according as they think the subject is in the possession of the Senate or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would say to the Senator from Missouri that the occupant of the Chair will receive the report. If any objection is made to it on the part of any Senator, it will be submitted to a vote of the Senate what shall be done.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state that the Senator from Michigan probably made his point one stage in advance of the place where he intended to make it. There surely can be no obstacle to our receiving the report. What he means is, that we cannot act upon the subject-matter of the bill until

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, APRIL 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 111.

the papers are here. That is another matter. Suppose we had met in the chamber of conference, and the conferees of the other House had torn the papers in pieces, could we not come and report that fact to the Senate? Should we be estopped from reporting because we had not the papers? We may report, and the other question is the question to be considered hereafter, when we propose to act on it. When that question comes up, I maintain that we should be governed by our own practice, if it differs from that of the Manual.

Mr. STUART. I may say in the outset that it is a bad way to decide any question by putting extreme cases, but I think I can answer the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, even in the case he puts. If there should be such an outrage that one branch of the committee destroyed the bill, they would not report under the parliamentary law as a committee of conference, but a Senator would rise and ask to report as a question of privilege—not a privileged question—that is, he would come here and have all other business suspended to take into consideration the outrage committed by a member of either body, and what action should be had upon that outrage, but having no effect whatever upon the bill, because if the bill is absolutely destroyed, and put out of sight, so far as legislation is concerned you must commence de novo, and pass another bill. There is no doubt about that.

Now, to show how correct the honorable Senator from Virginia was when he stated, and stated, I may say, too, in the most perspicuous language, that the bill is, for purposes of parliamentary consideration, where the law says it should be, no matter where it is in fact, let me read from the Manual:

"A conference may be asked before the House asking it has come to a resolution of disagreement, insisting or adhering, [3 Hats., 269, 341,] in which case, the papers are not left with the other conferees, but are brought back, to be the foundation of the vote to be given."

The Senate will see the reason of the rule in this case. Before we had voted whether we disagreed with the House amendment or not, we could have asked a conference, and in that event, the Senate committee would have retained the bill and brought it back here, to take the question whether we would agree or disagree, because we should have then to take the vote. Then it goes on to say:

"And in all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement!"

What I have been reading before was as to a conference asked before a vote of disagreement:

"In all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement, the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other; and in one case, where they refused to receive them, they were left on the table in the conference chamber."—10 Grey, 146.

So peremptory is the rule that the papers belong there, that, if that committee will not take them, they may be left on the table. That is this case.

Mr. BIGGS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to understand distinctly whether or not, from the ruling of the Chair, the Senator from Michigan interposes objection to making this report. It was stated by the Chair a little while ago, and I heard no response of objection, that if objection was not made, the report would be received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that he would receive the report; but it is competent to any Senator to move, for reasons he may assign, that the report shall not be received, and then it will depend on the vote of the Senate.

Mr. BIGGS. I did not understand the Senator from Michigan to make that motion.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a question of order. I understood the Senator from Michigan to make a point of order against the reception of this report, and the Chair overruled that point of order. Now the Senator is discussing the decision of the Chair. I say it is out of order to do that unless he takes an appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is not strictly in order to pursue the line of remark pursued by the Senator from Michigan, the Chair having decided that, as far as the Chair was concerned, the report should be received. It is competent for the Senator, in the judgment of the Chair, to move that the report be not received and assign his reasons for it, and let it go to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I was not disposed to make any cavil upon small questions here at all. I agree that according to strictness I am not in order, nor was the honorable Senator from Virginia, but yet we heard him with great pleasure, and I supposed I was stating the law in a manner that might not be disagreeable to the Senate. I do not desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I was making some preliminary remarks to show why, in answer to the Senator from Virginia, I was not premature in my objection. I have no doubt that the report being received, I can make the objection then, that it is not in order to act upon it until we have information from the House of Representatives. The suggestion can be made at either stage, and I was simply reading the law to show that in the first place it was mandatory that the bill should be there, and that the Senator was entirely correct when he said that the bill was, in parliamentary contemplation, where the law said it should be, no matter where it might be in point of fact.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senator from Michigan will not understand me as interposing the point of order for the purpose of cutting off his remarks.

Mr. STUART. Not at all.

Mr. BIGGS. I just wanted to know how the matter stood, and whether there was objection to receiving the report.

Mr. STUART. I was going to state that I thought in this case, and in any such case, it would be better not to receive the report; but I am far from wishing to controvert the opinion of a majority of the Senate. If a majority of the Senate wish to receive this report, and have it printed, and let the question of acting upon it be the one upon which the determination of this point shall be made, I acquiesce with a great deal of pleasure. But, sir, this subject is one of an unusual character; it is treated as of an unusual character; and therefore I desire to say that so far as I am concerned, I wish that the parliamentary law shall be strictly observed; and for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I move that the report be not received, for the reason that by the law the bill is not before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Missouri has the floor to make a report from a committee of conference. The Senator from Michigan moves that that report be not received.

Mr. BIGGS. I want to show, in a single word, what it seems to me is the absurdity of the position (with all due deference to the Senator from Michigan) that he now takes. Suppose this committee of conference had not agreed, and they came forward here to report to the Senate that there was a disagreement between the committee. I will assume that that is the report which is about to be made by the committee of conference. The Senator from Michigan says that the committee on the part of the Senate cannot report that fact to the Senate because the House of Representatives have not taken a vote, and sent the bill here.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator will allow me, I will relieve myself of what he supposes to be an absurdity in an instant. This law does not apply unless the committees agree, and the Senate's committee brings back the bill here and makes any other motion that any Senator agrees to make. It is in the case where they have agreed upon a report that the bill is to be with the House agreeing to the conference.

Mr. BIGGS. The question we are discussing here is upon strict parliamentary law; and still, without knowing what the report is—for aught we know it may be that there is disagreement between the two committees—the Senator interposes an objection here to any report at all being made from the committee of conference. I say the statement of the case shows most incontestably the absurdity of the position. But in regard to the main point, though the parliamentary law is that the papers in this case are in the possession of the conferees of the House of Representatives, still, where is the law which precludes the Senate from receiving and acting upon the report? Where is there any prohibition in parliamentary law?

Mr. STUART. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Take the case he puts of a bill in the House. That bill, in any event, goes to the House, and remains with the committee of the House. Suppose you receive the report here; what can you do? To show you that the absurdity is not with me, but with him, let me admit all that he claims, and take his own case. If there is any object in a report, it is a sensible object. If the committee of the Senate report that they cannot agree, what can they do without the bill?

Mr. BIGGS. I will state to the Senator what they can do.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear it.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to know whether or not they could not propose another committee of conference to the House?

Mr. STUART. Not without the bill.

Mr. BIGGS. Most unquestionably they could. Here is a committee of conference proposed—proposed by the Senate—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I rise to a question of order; and I call the honorable Senator from North Carolina to order, for being out of order, contrary to his own prescription of the rule in regard to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BIGGS. I submit whether I am in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the point of order?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I say the Senator is discussing a question which has been decided by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand. The Chair decided only, that the Senator from Missouri could make his report. The Senator from Michigan objected to its reception, and debate therefore is in order to show why it should not be received. The Chair understood the line of remark to be addressed to that point.

Mr. BIGGS. I certainly did not intend to violate any rule of order. I did not seek to make any remarks on this question until the motion was distinctly made by the Senator from Michigan that this report be not received, and I was then attempting to show what I considered the absurdity of a motion of that kind by the illustration which I gave. I now understand that I am strictly in order.

Then, sir, I again ask, on the main question that has been raised by the Senator from Michigan, although the papers may be left with the conferees of the House, though on some occasions it seems, by parliamentary law, they may be left on the conference table, where is the parliamentary law (and I ask the Senator to put his finger upon it in the Manual) that precludes either House from receiving the report of the conference committee, and acting upon that report without the bill? Where is that parliamentary law? I do not understand it so. I do not see it so in the Manual.

Then the case I put a little while ago is apposite and conclusive, it seems to me, on the question. Suppose, now, that we make an amendment to a House bill; the House of Representatives disagrees to it; a committee of conference is raised, and that committee of conference recommends that the Senate recede from their amendment. Now I should like to know why the Senate cannot receive the report of the committee of conference, concur in the report, recede from the amendment, and thus pass the bill. Is it requisite under circumstances of that kind, is it necessary at all, that the House of Representatives should act upon it before the Senate recedes? The act of receding passes the bill, because the very moment the Senate recedes from the amendment the Senate has acceded to the bill, and the bill is passed. When they concur in the report of the committee in that case, there is an end of the bill, and it becomes a law. But according to the Senator from Michigan, in a case of that kind the Senate committee could not make any report at all, the Senate could not act upon it at all, although the action of the Senate alone would be required to pass the bill.

It seems to me, therefore, with all due respect to the opinion and experience of the Senator from Michigan in regard to parliamentary law, and with all respect to him, this preliminary question is certainly an absurd one; and upon the main point it seems to me clear that the parliamentary law does not preclude that part of the committee which the Senate have appointed from reporting at any time, and does not preclude the Senate from taking action on their report.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STUART. Before the vote is taken on the adjournment, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to amend my motion so as to say that the report shall not be received at this time. I wish to have my motion in proper form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, resulted—yeas 23, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Post, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wright, and Yates—30.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. POLK. We have the motion of the Senator from Michigan distinctly before us now, and I think we all understand it, and probably all are ready to vote on it. I hope, therefore, the Senate will take a vote on that question immediately.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest a question of order. I understand that the Senator from Missouri offered to make a report, and the Chair decided that he would receive the report. The Senator from Michigan moves that the report be not received. My point of order is that it is an attempt by a vote of the Senate to contravene a direct ruling of the Chair without taking an appeal from it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand it.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri took the floor, and offered a report which the Chair was prepared to receive, as far as the action of the Chair was concerned; but the Chair could not receive the report against the will of the Senate. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, that the report be not received.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will now receive the report.

Mr. GREEN. Before I make the report, it may be proper to state that the bill and amendment have been in the possession of both branches of the committee of conference—that on the part of the House, and that on the part of the Senate. They were left in the office of the Secretary of the Senate. I drew them out and carried them before the committee of conference, and we all had the use of them, and access to them. I sent a request to have the bill sent to me here, in case I should make any statement in regard to its number, title, or any reference to it, to have the facts before me. It was brought in, but not surreptitiously; and when the Senator from California insinuated so, he may have had that information—I know not what his information was—but it is not the truth. Now I propose to make my report.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. BRODERICK. It is proper, in relation to the issue between the Senator from Missouri and myself, to state that the honorable Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, informed me that the bill had been surreptitiously taken from the desk of the Clerk of the House. I made the statement here, and I am ready to hold myself responsible for the declaration made to me by the honorable gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GREEN. No doubt the Senator is willing to be held responsible, but that responsibility would exist without being made.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have, sir—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will refrain from any personal remarks. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GREEN. I propose to make my report. I only made this reference because I thought it was due to the Senator from California and due to the parties concerned.

The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the Senate bill, numbered 161, entitled "A bill for the admission of the State of Kansas," report that they have had the subject under consideration, and have given it that careful, patient, and mature deliberation, which they conceive its importance demands; and have agreed upon an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment of the Senate bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope the gentleman will send the report to the Clerk's desk to be read. I believe that is the orderly way. We cannot hear him.

Mr. GREEN. After I have made my report, the Senator can call for its reading by the Clerk; but I claim the right to make my report. The committee earnestly recommend the adoption of this amendment to the two Houses of Congress. The bill which the Senate committee of conference report has been agreed to by the two committees in joint conference. I shall not read the proposed bill, but send it to the Clerk to be read, prefacing it with the remark that it may not come up to the full expectation of anybody. Respect for each other and conciliation should be the rule in cases of disagreement between equals. The Senate and House of Representatives are equals. Both represent the States; one represents the people of the States, and the other the States in their organized capacity. It is proper that a just regard for the rights and duties of each should be accorded. Therefore the Senate would not assume the right to dictate to the House of Representatives, nor acknowledge the right of that House to dictate to the Senate. The committee met in a spirit of conciliation. They tried various propositions: whether the best has been done that could be done remains for the country to judge. We believe it to be the best under the circumstances. We believe that it sacrifices no principle, that it harmonizes well with what the country expects and demands, and, without crossing the path or thwarting the purpose of either side, it opens a door for the admission of peace to spread over the entire Union, giving joy to those who have heretofore been afflicted with troubles in anticipation of misfortune. I ask the Clerk to read the amended bill reported by the committee of conference, and when it is read I shall move that it be printed.

The Clerk read the report; which is published in the proceedings of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Missouri whether he expects to have this subject considered to-night?

Mr. GREEN. By no means. I wish to propose the printing of the bill, so that all can see it.

Mr. SEWARD. With that explanation, I will barely state—what perhaps it is incumbent on me to say in the briefest form, and in the most general way—the considerations which determined the minority of the committee of conference to dissent from the report which has been made.

The minority of the committee, (Mr. HOWARD, of the House of Representatives, and myself,) as it is well known, have, throughout the debates, been of opinion that Kansas ought not, under any circumstances, to be subjected to the necessity of voting again upon the Lecompton constitution, they being satisfied that the people of Kansas had already considered and rejected that constitution solemnly and decisively. The minority dissented from this report, therefore, because it proposes to submit to them that constitution to be voted upon again, which they have already rejected, instead of providing for their admission into the Union under some other constitution to be adopted by themselves.

Again, they dissented for this further reason, that if the question was to be submitted to them whether they would accept or reject the Lecompton constitution, it ought to be submitted in a fair, just, and equal manner; whereas the bill which is reported by the committee of conference proposes to submit to them only one side. It holds out to them an inducement, "if you will accept the Lecompton constitution, come immediately into the Union, and you shall have the benefits of the lands which are described in the proposition now proposed to be made by Congress. If you will not come in under that constitution you shall not come in at all, until you shall have arrived at a stage at which you will have a population sufficient, according to the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives, to demand one Representative. Then, and not before, you may form a constitution and come to Congress and apply to be admitted." But this bill offers no consideration of public lands, if they shall come in with a different constitution at that time, or at any other time.

There was one further objection. While the bill, in effect, gives to the people the alternative of coming in under the Lecompton constitution, it seemed to the minority of the committee to be evasive in the form of the submission of that question. It does not submit to the people of Kansas the direct question whether they will accept the Lecompton constitution, or the question in another form, which might possibly be distinguished as direct, namely: whether they would come into the Union under the Lecompton constitution; but it submits a proposition in which the Lecompton constitution is not at all mentioned, and which relates merely to the disposition of the public lands, the benefits which the new State will derive from the public lands to be reserved for them, and then declares that, upon the acceptance of this proposition, the State shall be in the Union, and, by necessary effect, that it shall be so in the Union under the Lecompton constitution. But if they shall vote not to accept the proposition of Congress about the public lands, then it shall be deemed and taken, not only that they reject that proposition, but it shall be further deemed and taken, that they are unwilling to come in under the Lecompton constitution. That is, you submit to the people one question, and their answer to that question shall be deemed and taken to answer another one, not submitted to them at all.

This is submitting but one side. In other words, it seemed to me—and I suppose to my associate from the House of Representatives—that it was like the submission in the case of the French Emperor; when the third Napoleon submitted to the people of France whether they would elect him to be Emperor, they were allowed to vote for him or against him, but they were not allowed to vote for anybody else. The people of Kansas may accept or reject the Lecompton constitution; but if they reject this one, they shall have no other. We could not believe that the disposition of the subject, thus recommended by the committee of conference, would be acceptable to the people of Kansas; we do not believe it will tend to produce that happy result which the honorable chairman has anticipated.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the report be printed; and I will take this occasion to remark that the report is but some half dozen lines in itself; but the bill is a part of the report.

Mr. HUNTER. The motion to print the report will include the substitute.

Mr. GREEN. Of course. I intended merely to remark that the Senator from New York misapprehends the purport and the object of the committee. While his argument would have a tendency to raise a double prejudice, on the one side North, and on the other side South; and while a good deal of dexterity seems to have been displayed—no doubt honestly entertained by him—yet I think neither South nor North will be misled by his argument; they will look at the bill; they will see in it a fairness which commends itself to the entire Union. I desire also to move to make this report the special order for some time that will meet the approbation of the Senate. ["To-morrow."] I will say to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. STUART. I cannot consent to that. The Senate decided that they would receive this report, and I do not object to its being printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the motion to make this report the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. STUART. My understanding was, that it was only proposed to make the report, and to order it to be printed. The Senator from Missouri distinctly announced that as his object. He said he did not expect to act upon it. ["To-day."] It is action upon it to assign a day for its consideration; and, if that day is in advance of the reception of the message announcing the action of the House, it is in opposition to my objection. I am not willing that it should be acted upon until the bill is acted upon in the House, and sent here.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us have the vote.

Mr. STUART. I am not ready to vote. I am making an objection to the consideration of this measure until it is before us, and it cannot be before us until it is sent here from the House of Representatives. As I have already said, I have no desire to be captious. I was willing, the sense of the Senate being so, that the report of the committee should be printed; that the Senator from Missouri should make his statement; that the Senator from New York should make his; but I am not willing that the action of the Senate shall be had upon this question when the question itself is not before us, and may never receive the final action of the House of Representatives, so that the bill may never come here. It is conceded by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] that the bill is in the House of Representatives; it may never come here; and if it does not come here, why are we voting upon a substitute for it? With these views of the question, and every purpose having been attained, I move that the Senate adjourn; and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BELL, when his name was called, rose and said: Mr. President, I find that the Senator from Maryland—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator that the call of the roll cannot be arrested, a Senator having answered.

Mr. BELL. I understand that perfectly well; but I believe it has been usual to yield to members when they desire to make a statement assigning a reason for not voting and not arguing the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is express that the Senator must answer to his name, and he is not at liberty to assign any reason.

Mr. BELL. I will appeal to the Senate from the decision of the Chair. I wanted to state that I had made an arrangement with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE], who was imperatively called away, to pair off with him upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. BELL. I appeal to the Senate to allow me to state my position. ["Go on!"] I have no choice here at all. I want merely to state that, perhaps, I ought not to vote on this question of adjournment; and therefore I will not. I had some hesitation about it. Upon any question in relation to the main proposition, of course I would not vote.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. What is the question now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On making this report a special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope that will not be insisted on. The order for printing has been made, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order for printing has been made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Well, gentlemen must perceive that fixing to-morrow at one o'clock is rendering the printing a mere nugatory order. The report is of some length, and if the matter is to be deliberated upon, or accurately understood, it is impossible that we shall be prepared, if there were no other objection, by to-morrow at one o'clock. I ask it not for the purpose of delay; nobody will suppose that I make any such obstructive opposition to any measure merely for delay; but it seems to me that time is necessary for the consideration of the subject, and I do hope that gentlemen will not insist upon fixing it at so early an hour as one o'clock to-morrow. I understand furthermore that the bill is not here. Fixing this subject for consideration to-morrow is acting upon the bill. I am no great adept, I am not very skillful on questions of order. I defer to the Chair to decide, in the first place, whether it is in order for us to make such a motion, the bill being in the other House, and our action being necessarily subsequent to, and dependent upon, the action of that House.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to propose to the Senator that we say Monday. ["Very well."]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Provided the bill is here.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. That would be time enough so far as regards that. This other question, however, must remain, whether we can act on it. I do not care whether the question of order is decided now, but that question must come up. I do not want delay, and the time proposed would be satisfactory enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri modifies his motion.

Mr. GREEN. If it is more acceptable to the Senator, I modify it thus.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the report be made the order of the day for Monday at one o'clock?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest that, before we adjourn, we take up the deficiency bill, so as to make it the special order for to-morrow, though I believe it will be. ["Oh, yes."]

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 23, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. L. D. FINCKEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make two or three corrections in the report of my remarks as published in the Globe of yesterday. I am made to say "we have no such bills before us this session for any of the States, and therefore we have no use for these maps." I meant to say that we have no bills before us asking grants of lands for any States which have heretofore received grants.

I am made to say, in relation to these maps, that—

"This resolution does not entirely conform to the view I entertain; but as it is, I am satisfied with it."

I did not say that I was satisfied; but that I must submit.

In another portion of my remarks I am made to say as follows:

"I do not believe I shall give you a Kansas speech, although I have been exceedingly anxious during the session to make one. I fear that, in all probability, I might get into too deep water, as I do not understand the exact turn that politics may take at home."

I did not say "at home;" I said "here." I never consult the condition of politics at home to govern my action here. I do what I believe to be right, without reference to the sentiment at home. I meant to say that I should wait until I saw the drift politics should take in this House. I hope that to-day we shall see a demonstration here, such as will give satisfaction to many of us, if not to the entire country.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report two appropriation bills, in order that they may be printed for the use of the House and of the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the House to take notice that it is the gentleman from New York who objects to the progress of the public appropriation bills.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE FIRE BILL.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Before the vote is taken upon that motion, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate on House bill No. 204, in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar shall terminate in two hours after the consideration of the same shall be resumed in committee.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is no cause for adopting the resolution. This is objection day, and no debate is in order in committee.

Mr. SAVAGE. I make the point of order that yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow, having been devoted by resolution of the House to the consideration of the pension bill in committee as a special order, the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union must take precedence of the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I submit that all rules having been suspended for the purpose of making the bill to which I have alluded a special order, my motion must take precedence of all others.

The SPEAKER. If the special order to which the gentleman refers had been made in the House as well as in the committee, the point of order would have been well taken by the gentleman from Tennessee. The fact of its having been made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, however, does not affect the operation of the rules in the House. Inasmuch, therefore, as the bill was not made the special order in the House, the Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to go into Committee of the Whole House takes precedence.

Mr. MASON. Upon what principle does the Chair decide that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. Because to-day is Friday, and a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on this day, under the rules of the House, must take precedence of a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] to close debate, however, must take precedence of both.

Mr. CLEMENS. I should like to know what bill it is upon which the gentleman proposes to close debate?

The SPEAKER. The New York fire bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is this not objection day, upon which no debate can be allowed in committee?

The SPEAKER. This is objection day.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move the previous question upon the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the resolution of the gentleman from New York be adopted, when we go into committee to-day, if objection be made to taking up the fire bill, the two hours will not be consumed, and all debate upon that bill therefore be cut off?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the effect of the passage of that resolution be as it has been suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that if the resolution be adopted no further debate is in order in committee to-day, inasmuch as this is objection day.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If there be doubt about the resolution, I withdraw it.

There was no objection, and the resolution was withdrawn.

The question recurred on Mr. CHAFFEE's motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SAVAGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RUSSELL and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and one, noes not counted.

Mr. SAVAGE. It is evident that this motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House is pressed by those who wish to defeat the old soldiers' pension bill, which is the special order for this day in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I want a record of those who vote to go into a Committee of the Whole House, and therefore demand the yeas and nays.

On a count, only twenty-eight voted for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SAVAGE. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WARREN and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered, the tellers having reported—yeas thirty-five; more than one fifth of those present.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bock, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Clemens, Clingan, Cobb, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Burton, Craige, Crawford, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foster, Gilman, Goeh, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grossbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Houston, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Ganey Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Lench, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Miles, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Blair, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, James Craig, Curtis, Dean, Elliott, Fenton, Foley, Garrett, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hill, Hughes, Jackson, Keitt, Kelly, Lawrence, Leidy, Maclay, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Edward Joy Morris, Niblack, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Robbins, Savage, Samuel A. Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Underwood, Waldron, Warren, Watkins, Wilson, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—64.

So the motion was agreed to. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Grow in the chair) stated, that this being objection day, the Calendar would be called, commencing with the first case upon it; and that bills to which objection should be made would be passed over.

CYRUS H. McCORMICK.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 11) upon the petition of Cyrus H. McCormick.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

WILLIAM NEILL.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 30) upon the petition of William Neill and others.

Mr. FLORENCE objected.

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL.

A bill (H. R. No. 197) for the relief of Charles J. Ingersoll.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

BARCLAY AND LIVINGSTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 204) to refund to Barclay and Livingston and others duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York on the 19th day of July, 1845.

Mr. LAWRENCE objected.

HENRY LEEF AND JOHN M'KEE.

A bill (H. R. No. 206) to indemnify Henry Leef and John McKee for illegal seizure of a certain bark.

Mr. MILLSON objected.

WILLIAM SMITH.

A bill (H. R. No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana.

Mr. LETCHER. I objected to this bill when the Calendar was under consideration before, on the ground that I did not think the patent was going to the right person. I see, by an examination of the papers since, that all the parties interested agree that it should go as provided by this bill, and I shall make no further objection.

The bill provides that the claim of William Smith to six hundred and forty acres of land, now occupied by William B. Allen, in the parish of Livingston, in the State of Louisiana, and being the same he resided on at the time of his death, and settled originally by Stephen Terry, and represented on the map of surveys as section thirty-nine, in township number six south, of range number three east; and section number sixty, in township number six south, of range number two east, shall be confirmed to William Smith, and to his heirs and representatives; and that a patent shall be issued therefor as in other cases; provided that this act shall only operate as a relinquishment forever, on the part of the United States, to the land, and shall not interfere with adverse valid rights of others, if such exist.

From the report it appears that by the act of 3d March, 1819, "for adjusting the claims to land and establishing land offices in the districts east of the Island of New Orleans," every person, or his or her legal representative, embraced in the list of actual settlers, where the land claimed or settled on had been actually inhabited or cultivated on or before the 15th day of April, 1813, should be entitled to a donation grant of six hundred and forty acres of land. Allen claims six hundred and forty acres under the provisions of this act; and to sustain his claim submits the following leading facts, sworn to by several credible witnesses: one gentleman states that his acquaintance with the land claimed commenced in 1808; another, in 1813; and that they were told that it was settled by Stephen Terry, in 1803, and believed, from the appearance of everything about it, that the improvements might have commenced at that time; that William Smith, in 1808 and 1813, and for some time after the latter period, occupied and cultivated it; and that it was the same place now claimed and occupied by William B. Allen, and known on the surveys as section twenty-nine of township six south, of range three east, and section sixty of township six south, of range two east, and is represented on the maps of the land office as "claimed by Stephen Terry," but "no confirmation found."

Hon. Thomas Green Davidson states that he has actual knowledge of the place since 1826, and legal knowledge as to his other statements. He says that he was on the place first in 1826; had lived near it since that time, and is satisfied, from all appearances, that it had been cultivated for twenty years or more when he first knew it; and that it was known as the Smith or Terry place, and has been inhabited and cultivated up to this time; and that to his knowledge, taxes were assessed and paid on it for the heirs of Smith until about 1842, when John Holloway purchased it at a public sale; since which time, taxes have been paid on it by Holloway and those holding under him; that it was notorious that the commissioners appointed under act of Congress, to report upon private land claims in Louisiana, had received notice and proof of Smith, under Terry, and all the country considered the claim had been confirmed, and that one of the witnesses, who died last year, declared to him that he was present when Smith gave his notice and made his proof.

Mr. Davidson further states, that he was for five years register of the Greensburg land district, appointed in 1829, and that the notice and proofs of settlement for the neighborhood, where is located the land in question, were all burned by the fire which destroyed much of the land office and its records; and that the parties whose land claim papers were thus destroyed were required in 1819 to file anew for confirmation; but that Smith died in 1819, and that his children (being minors) were carried to Georgia by their friends, and no one attended to their interest in the matter. That his legal knowledge extends to the settlement of the place by Stephen Terry in 1803, who was the cousin of William Smith, and were both from the State of Georgia; and that Terry sold the place to Smith and moved to Mississippi in 1805. That William Smith lived on the place until 1819; when he and his wife both died; no debts were left, and the place was cultivated and the taxes paid on it by a Mr. Fleming until 1839, when Fleming died; and that in 1842 the place was sold for the taxes due on it, as the property of William Smith, deceased, and was bought by John Holloway; and that the taxes have been paid on it ever since by Holloway and those holding under him; and that under the laws of Louisiana such possession, as between individuals, would perfect the title in the present occupant, William R. Allen.

On motion of Mr. SANDIDGE, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

PIERRE BROUSSARD.

A bill (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased.

The bill provides that the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased, late of Louisiana, shall be confirmed in their title to a certain tract of land situated on the Bayou Teche, in the parish of St. Martin, in Louisiana, and known on the recognized public surveys as section thirty-six, in township eight south, of range five east, containing about one hundred and seventy acres; provided that this confirmation shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect any adverse rights, if any such there be.

From the report it appears that the Chevalier Declouet had a large tract of land, situated on the Bayou Teche, in Louisiana, in his possession as owner, some time before the cession of the territory to the United States; that portions of this large tract of land were sold to different individuals by the Chevalier before the change of government, and among others to Pierre Broussard, in 1796; that at the time of the change of government a portion of the lands embraced in the original tract of Declouet still remained in the possession of members of his family, and that the whole tract was possessed and inhabited by Pierre Broussard and his family, or by the Declouet family, and formed an unbroken front on the Bayou Teche; that the owners of the different portions presented their titles to the boards of commissioners established for the settlement of land titles in Louisiana, and that they were confirmed in their claims respectively, but that the surveying department of the Government has surveyed the different titles confirmed in such a manner as to represent a portion of the land purchased by Pierre Broussard from the Chevalier Declouet on the 10th of May, 1796, as public land. The act of sale from Declouet to Pierre Broussard, is filed with the papers; and it is shown, by the affidavits of witnesses, that the land on the Teche designated as section thirty-six, in township eight south, range five east, and containing about one hundred and seventy acres, and now represented as public land, was established and cultivated by Pierre Broussard under his purchase, at least fifty-eight years ago, and that it has been continually occupied and cultivated by him or his descendants, or those holding under him, to the present time.

On motion of Mr. SANDIDGE, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM CONWAY.

The next bill on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased."

The bill and preamble were read, as follows:

Whereas the heirs of William Conway, deceased, or their legal representatives, have never been able to avail themselves of the provisions in their favor contained in an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased," partly because of some error or mistake as to the location of the portion of the lands applied for under the act, and partly because of the existence of a legal controversy between the parties in interest under the provisions of said act: Therefore—

Be it enacted, &c., That the said act, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased," approved July 3, 1836, be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued in force for one year from the passage of this act, and no longer.

The report, which was read, states that on the 2d July, 1836, Congress passed an act authorizing the representatives of said Conway to locate, within twelve months from the passage of the act, on any unappropriated public land in the State of Louisiana subject to public entry, one thousand and seventy acres in a body, in contiguous tracts, according to the legal subdivisions of the public surveys; and also two thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine acres, under the same limitations, in consideration of the release, within twelve months, by the said heirs or legal representatives, in favor of the United States, of the land originally included in three grants from the Government of Spain, and confirmed by the commissioner for investigating land titles in the district west of Pearl river, by reports numbered 48, 49, and 50. And that, in accordance with said act of Congress, (as appears from a communication made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office,) a certificate was issued by the register and receiver of the land office at Monroe, Louisiana, on the 26th of June, 1837, to Augustus S. Phelps, the representative of the heirs aforesaid, for one thousand and sixty-six acres and seven hundredths of an acre, in full satisfaction of the one thousand and seventy acres granted by the act of July, 1836, which was located upon certain described lands; and that the said lands thus described have since been sold by the Government to other parties, and been patented to them; and that there was nothing in his office showing that any attempt had been made to locate the remaining portion of two thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine acres. In the absence of the papers submitted by the Hon. MILES TAYLOR, when the bill was first introduced, in August last, giving the reasons why no lands had been obtained, and no attempt made to locate the largest portion of the grant, and which cannot now be found by the clerks of the House, the committee have taken the statement of Mr. TAYLOR himself, who, from having been at one time counsel for some of the parties in interest under the said act, says that it was in consequence of a legal contest then going on, and which continued for several years, between those parties. As the parties, by the Government sale to others, lost the location made within the period fixed by law, and could not locate any portion of remainder, for the reason stated, the committee see no reason why the said act of 1836 should not be revived for another year's time. And, although it is now impossible to find in said State, in compact bodies, such a quantity of land, of much value, the committee have not thought proper to recommend any change in the original law; and report back the bill, without amendment, for the favorable consideration of the House.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

REGIS LOISEL.

The next case on the Calendar was taken up, being a bill (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives.

The bill, which was read, provides that Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives, be confirmed in their title to a certain tract of land ceded by Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, Spanish Governor of Upper Louisiana, on the 25th of March, 1800, to Regis Loisel, situate in what was then known as Upper Louisiana, on the Missouri river, including Cedar Island, as it was surveyed on the 20th of November, 1805, by Antonio Soulard, surveyor general for the Territory of Louisiana, according to the plat now on file in the archives of the Missouri district. But it is provided that if said tract of land, or any part thereof, has been located by any other person, under any law of the United States, or has been surveyed and sold by the United States, this act shall confer no title to such lands in opposition to the rights acquired by such location or purchase; but Loisel, or his legal representatives, shall be permitted to make a relocation on an equal amount of the public lands as may be taken by such location or purchase, that may be subject to entry at private sale, at a price not to exceed $1 25 per acre; and the surveyor general for the district of Missouri shall issue a certificate to authorize the same.

The second section provides that the location authorized by this act shall be entered with the register of the proper land office, who shall, on application for that purpose, make out a certificate of such location as in other cases; and if it shall appear to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the certificate has been obtained according to the provisions of the act, then patents shall issue as in other cases. And it is further provided, that if it shall be found that the tract of land has not been located by any other person, or has not been sold by the United States, in that case a patent shall be issued for the same as in other cases.

The report, which was read, states, that, on the 25th of March, A. D. 1800, the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Louisiana granted to Regis Loisel a certain tract of land on the Missouri river, about twelve hundred miles from its mouth, including Cedar Island; that the same was surveyed by Don Antonio Soulard, surveyor general for Upper Louisiana, and a plat made thereof; that all the papers and documents relative to the same were recorded in the recorder's office established for the recording of land titles in Upper Louisiana, according to the act of Congress in such cases made and provided; that, in August, 1806, and in September, 1810, application was made to the board of commissioners to have said claim confirmed; that the same was rejected, and claimants required to furnish further proof. That, in July 1833, and November, 1834, the same was again presented for confirmation, and additional proof given; but the same was not confirmed, because said board held that they did not have jurisdiction of the case; that over three hundred claims that were reported favorably on by the committee that acted under the acts of 1832-33, and confirmed by the act of 1836, were rejected by the former board of commissioners; that said grant is absolute and unconditional; and that it appears from the same, and the petition to the Lieutenant Governor, that the said Loisel had established a fort on said tract of land in the Indian country, at his own expense, and that he had rendered important services to his Government in discovering and exploring the Indian country and establishing amicable relations between them and his Government; that in so doing he had suffered heavy losses.

The committee state that, from the petition to the Lieutenant Governor, the grant by him, and survey by the surveyor of Upper Louisiana, and the evidence taken before the board of commissioners, and now of record, they are satisfied that said petitioner's grant and survey were made in good faith, and are genuine. The committee are of opinion that from the stipulations of the treaty by which we acquired Louisiana, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to these inchoate Spanish titles, rights were vested in Regis Loisel; that justice and good faith on the part of this Government require that his rights should be protected, and that the claim should be confirmed to Loisel, or his legal representatives. The third article of the treaty of the 30th April, 1803, by which France ceded to the United States the Louisiana Territory, provides that "the inhabitants of the ceded Territory shall be incorporated in the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion which they possess." (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 8, page 202.)

In the case of Chouteau's heirs vs. the United States, (volume 9, Peters's Reports, page 137,) Judge Marshall says: "The lieutenant governor was also a sub-delegate, and as such was authorized to make inchoate grants. They are property, capable of being alienated, of being subject to debts, and are as such to be held as sacred and inviolate as other property." If Judge Marshall is right that these inchoate grants are property then they are protected by treaty; and when the inhabitants of the ceded territory were incorporated into the United States, we were bound by the treaty to complete their titles. "Our national honor demands it. It cannot be that the United States will violate the treaty, and confiscate the lands of the inhabitants in the ceded territory. In the case of Delassus vs. the United States, (Peters, volume 9, page 117,) Judge Marshall says: "The stipulations of the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, affording that protection or security to claims under the French or Spanish Governments to which the acts of Congress refer, are in the first, second, and third articles. They extend to all property until Louisiana became a member of the Union, into which the inhabitants were incorporated as soon as possible, and admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States. The perfect inviolability and security of property is among these rights. The right of property is protected and secured by the treaty; and no principle is better settled in this country than that an inchoate title to land is property. This right would have been reserved independent of the treaty. The sovereign who acquires an inhabited country acquires full dominion over it; but this dominion is never supposed to divest the vested rights of individuals in property. The language of the treaty ceding Louisiana excludes any idea of interfering with private property. The concession to the petitioner was legally made by the proper authorities. A grant or concession made by the officer who is by law authorized to make it carries with it prima facie evidence that it is within his power. He who alleges that an officer, intrusted with an important duty, has violated his instructions, must show it."

The committee report a bill confirming the grant or concession.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ENGLISH. On yesterday I gave notice to the House that I intended, at one o'clock to-day, to make a report from the committee of conference in relation to the disagreeing votes between the two Houses upon the bill for the admission of Kansas. To enable me to make a report, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROW reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had several bills under consideration, and had directed him to report to the House, bills of the House Nos. 209, 211, 100, and 214, with a recommendation that they do pass.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am instructed by the committee of conference, appointed by the two Houses upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill entitled "A bill for the admission of Kansas," to make the report which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The report was read, and is as follows:

The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the Senate bill No. 161, entitled "A bill for the admission of the State of Kansas," report that they have had the subject under consideration, and have given it that careful, patient, and mature deliberation which they conceive its importance demands, and have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment to the Senate bill.

They earnestly recommend the adoption of this amendment by the two Houses of Congress.

JAMES S. GREEN,

R. M. T. HUNTER,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM H. ENGLISH,

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The undersigned, one of the managers on the part of the Senate, does not agree in the foregoing report.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The undersigned, one of the managers on the part of the House, does not agree in the foregoing report.

WILLIAM A. HOWARD.

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates assembled at Leecompton, on the 7th day of November, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution is republican; and whereas, at the same time and place, said convention did adopt an ordinance, which said ordinance asserts that Kansas, when admitted as a State, will have an undoubted right to tax the lands within her limits belonging to the United States, and proposes to relinquish said asserted right if certain conditions set forth in said ordinance be accepted and agreed to by the Congress of the United States; and whereas, the said constitution and ordinance have been presented to Congress by order of said convention, and admission of said Territory into the Union thereon, as a State, requested; and whereas, said ordinance is not acceptable to Congress, and it is desirable to ascertain whether the people of Kansas concur in the changes in said ordinance hereinafter stated, and desire admission into the Union as a State as herein proposed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, but upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the question of admission with the following proposition in lieu of the ordinance framed at Leecompton be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them or a majority of the voters voting at an election to be held for that purpose, namely: That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the people of Kansas for acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory on the United States, and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit: First, that sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township of public lands in said State, or, where either of said sections or any part thereof has been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools. Second, that seventy-two sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the support of a State university, to be selected by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to be appropriated and applied in such manner as the Legislature of said State may prescribe for the purpose aforesaid, but for no other purpose.

Third, that ten entire sections of land, to be selected by the Governor of said State, in legal subdivisions, shall be granted to said State for the purpose of completing the public buildings, or for the erection of others at the seat of government, under the direction of the Legislature thereof.

Fourth, that all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use, the same to be selected by the Governor thereof, within one year after the admission of said State, and when so selected to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature may direct.

Provided, That no salt spring or land, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may hereafter be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall, by this article, be granted to said State.

Fifth, that five per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements, as the Legislature shall direct.

Provided, The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that said State of Kansas shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the lands of the United States, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof, and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents.

Sixth, and that said State shall never tax the lands or property of the United States in that State. At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, "proposition accepted," or "proposition rejected."

Should a majority of the votes cast be for "proposition accepted," the President of the United States, as soon as the fact is duly made known to him, shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute, and said State shall be entitled to one member in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, until the next census be taken by the Federal Government. But should a majority of the votes cast be for "proposition rejected," it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in said proposition, and in that event the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and may elect delegates for that purpose, whenever, and not before, it is ascertained, by a census, duly and legally taken, that the population of said Territory equals or exceeds the ratio of representation required for a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and whenever thereafter such delegates shall assemble in convention, they shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time, and if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to such limitations and restrictions as to the mode and manner of its approval or ratification by the people of the proposed State as they may have prescribed by law, and shall be entitled to admission into the Union as a State under such constitution thus fairly and legally made with or without slavery, as said constitution may prescribe.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the election authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor, United States district attorney, and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of its Legislature, namely, the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end. Any three of them shall constitute a board, and the board shall have power and authority to designate and establish precincts for voting, or to adopt those already established; to cause the polls to be opened at such places as it may deem proper in the respective counties and election precincts of said Territory; to appoint, as judges of election, at each of the several places of voting, three discreet and respectable persons, any two of whom shall be competent to act; to require the sheriffs of the several counties, by themselves or deputies, to attend the judges at each of the places of voting, for the purpose of preserving peace and good order; or the said board may, instead of said sheriffs and their deputies, appoint, at their discretion, and in such instances as they may choose, other fit persons for the same purpose. The election hereby authorized shall continue one day only, and shall not be continued later than sundown on that day. The said board shall appoint the day for holding said election, and the said Governor shall announce the same by proclamation; and the day shall be as early a one as is consistent with due notice thereof to the people of said Territory, subject to the provisions of this act. The said board shall have full power to prescribe the time, manner, and places of said election, and to direct the time and manner of the returns thereof, which returns shall be made to the said board, whose duty it shall be to announce the result by proclamation; and the said Governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States without delay.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in the election hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who possess the qualifications which were required by the laws of said Territory for a legal voter at the last general election for members of the Territorial Legislature, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the citizens to the right of suffrage in said election; and if any person not so qualified shall vote or offer to vote, or if any person shall vote more than once, at said election, or shall make or cause to be made any false, fictitious, or fraudulent returns, or shall alter or change any returns of said election, such person shall, upon conviction thereof before any competent court of jurisdiction, be kept at hard labor for not less than six months and not more than three years.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the aforesaid board of commissioners, and all persons appointed by them to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall, before entering upon their duties, take an oath to perform faithfully the duties of their respective offices, and on failure thereof they shall be liable and subject to the same charges and penalties as are provided in like cases under the territorial laws.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall receive for their services the same compensation as is given for like services under the territorial laws.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the state of the public business at this advanced period of the session, and of the fact that this subject has already been more thoroughly discussed than, perhaps, any other ever before Congress, I do not propose making any extended remarks; but I am authorized by a majority of the committee of conference on the part of the House to submit some of the views which they entertain in relation to the pending question, and which, in part, have influenced their action. They assumed the duties intrusted to them by the House, deeply impressed with the heavy responsibilities resting upon them.

A great question—perhaps the greatest of the age—one which has agitated and engrossed the public mind for the past four years—has at last come to a crisis; and its probable solution is brought directly to the decision of the representatives of the States and the people.

Whilst adhering to what they believe to be correct principles, the committee endeavored to discard that spirit which would endanger the passage of a great measure, and probably hazard the peace of the country, for the sake of an unimportant point or unmeaning word.

The amendment proposed as a substitute is the very best that the committee were able to agree upon in view of the embarrassing circumstances surrounding the question.

It is true that it proposes the admission of the State on a condition; but in this respect it does not differ from either the Senate bill or House amendment. Both of these measures propose admission on conditions varying in their character and object. Nor does it differ from several precedents in other cases, such as those of Michigan and Iowa. The reason of the propriety, if not necessity, of a condition in the case of Kansas grows out of the peculiar nature of the application. This is fully exemplified in the Senate bill; for the admission in it is on an "express condition," which, however, makes no provision for the acceptance by the people of Kansas of the terms therein prescribed. What might be the effect of this omission is not altogether clear. The ordinance adopted by the convention at Leecompton, and submitted with the constitution, asserts that "the State of Kansas will possess the undoubted right to tax such lands for the support of her State government, or for other proper and legitimate purposes connected with her existence as a State." And this asserted right she proposes, on admission, to surrender, in consideration that the Congress of the United States will make her the following grants, namely:

"Sec. 1. That sections numbered eight, sixteen, twenty-four, and thirty-six, in every township in the State, or in case either of said numbered sections are or shall be otherwise disposed of, that other lands, equal thereto in value, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to the State to be applied exclusively to the support of common schools."

"Sec. 2. That all salt springs, and gold, silver, copper, lead, or other valuable mines, together with the lands necessary for their full occupation and use, shall be granted to said State for the use and benefit of said State; and the same shall be used or disposed of under such terms and conditions and regulations as the Legislature of said State shall direct."

"Sec. 3. That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands sold or held in trust or otherwise lying within the said State, whether sold before or after the admission of the State into the Union, after deducting all expenses incidental to the same, shall be paid to said State of Kansas for the purposes following, to wit: two-fifths to be disbursed under the direction of the Legislature of the State for the purpose of aiding the construction of railroads within said State, and the residue for the support of common schools."

"Sec. 4. That seventy-two sections, or two entire townships, shall be designated by the President of the United States, which shall be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and appropriated by the Legislature of said State solely to the use of said seminary."

"Sec. 5. That each alternate section of land now owned, or which may hereafter be acquired by the United States for twelve miles on each side of a line of railroad to be established or located from some point on the northern bound, any of the State, leading southerly through said State in the direction of the Gulf of Mexico, and on each side of a line of railroad to be located and established from some point on the Missouri river, westwardly through said State in the direction of the Pacific ocean, shall be reserved and conveyed to said State of Kansas for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad; and it shall be the duty of the Congress of the United States, in conjunction with the proper authorities of this State, to adopt immediate measures for carrying the several provisions herein contained into full effect."

The proposition made to Congress by this ordinance is of the most extraordinary character, and wholly inadmissible. A carefully-prepared estimate made at the General Land Office, at the request of the committee, shows that Kansas would receive an aggregate in lands, under her ordinance, of twenty-three million five hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty acres, worth, at the minimum Government price, $29,490,200; and this is exclusive of other benefits claimed, and of what she might receive for lands containing mines of the useful and precious metals, except coal lands. The amendment agreed to by the committee proposes to give her the usual grants which have been made to most of the new States, and which embrace precisely the same quantity proposed to be given by the Crittenden amendment. Under this amendment, Kansas would receive some twenty million acres of land less than she would receive under her ordinance; making a difference in favor of the United States—estimating the land at the minimum price—of $25,000,000.

The amendment agreed upon may not be perfect; but, if this fail, it is fair to presume that all available parliamentary expedients for reconciliation will be exhausted, and that the question will be left open to still further excite sectional prejudices, and endanger the peace and prosperity of the country.

If the substitute is passed, the Kansas question departs at once from the Halls of Congress, perhaps never to return; but even if it should return, it will be at some future period, and deprived of all power of doing evil. The ship of State will have passed the breakers, and glided into a smooth and open sea, where there is reason to hope there will be no sectional storm for many years to come. The committee cannot see that the bill would be otherwise than beneficial to the people of Kansas, whilst they feel entirely certain that it would promote the best interests of the country at large. It is one of those cases, as they conceive, where much is to be gained and nothing lost, so far as desirable results are concerned.

Should the substitute be defeated, and the question left open, the committee very much fear the consequences would be unfortunate for the country, and that angry and threatening clouds would soon obscure her destiny.

The probabilities are that the agitation would continue in its most malignant form to excite the people, to separate the North from the South, and no man can foresee what would be the final result. The tendency would be to scatter terror and alarm throughout the country, paralyze its business, injuriously affect the value of private property, convulse the Union, and endanger its very existence. It will indeed be a fearful responsibility to hazard for a slight cause all the blessings which flow from the union of these States.

There are great occasions in the progress of nations which, if wisely embraced, may exert a salutary influence upon their destiny for ages to come; but if neglected there can be no recovery from the evil consequences which may follow.

Such an occasion is now presented to the House, in the judgment of the committee; and having discharged their duty to the best of their ability under their convictions, they leave all others to act likewise for themselves.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. ENGLISH. I have the floor, and I do not yield it to the gentleman from Ohio. I yield it to my colleague on the committee of conference, [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. He is entitled to it without any yielding on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to occupy some five minutes' time expressing—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. ENGLISH. I did not yield the floor for the purpose of allowing my colleague on the committee an opportunity of submitting any remarks, but for the purpose of submitting a proposition, which I understood he wished to submit.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Indiana refuse to allow his colleague to be heard?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is not in order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if the gentleman from Indiana has the right to retain the floor, yield it to another member for five minutes to make a speech inside his speech, and then cut off all further debate by demanding the previous question?

Mr. ENGLISH. I will relieve the gentleman on his point of order, by saying that I propose nothing of the kind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan cannot occupy the floor during the time of the gentleman from Indiana, if it is objected to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, sir, I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. I understood that the gentleman from Michigan wished to submit the motion that the bill be printed, and that its consideration be postponed until some future day.

Mr. HOWARD. That is my purpose at the present time, but I wish that at some time, as a matter of courtesy on the part of the House, I may have five minutes to discuss the merits of the report.

Several MEMBERS, (on the Democratic side of the House.) Have it now.

Mr. ENGLISH. I make the motion that the bill be printed, and that its further consideration be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow. I understand that it will be printed perhaps soon enough for members to get it before the House adjourns to-day. I call for the previous question upon the motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. Will not the effect of the previous question, if seconded, be to cut off the motion to postpone, and bring the House to a direct vote upon the reception of the report of the committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to suggest that the motion to postpone would be cut off by the previous question. The motion to postpone, however, is debatable only to a very limited extent—merely to the extent of assigning reasons why the matter should or should not be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock. The merits of the question are not open to debate.

Mr. ENGLISH. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOWARD. I have felt constrained to withhold my assent from this report, and I will now state briefly the reasons why. It is true, as has been said by my colleague, that this question has been very fully and very ably discussed, and I do not want to protract that discussion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that the merits of the report are open to discussion upon the motion to postpone.

Mr. HOWARD. I thought the motion to postpone had been withdrawn.

Mr. ENGLISH. No, sir; I withdrew the call for the previous question, not the motion to postpone.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the House, having heard the report read, will not vote upon the postponement till to-morrow at one o'clock, without further debate. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope, as a speech has been made in favor of the report, the gentleman from Michigan will be heard on the other side.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the merits of the report being discussed, the gentleman from Michigan must confine himself strictly to the motion to postpone.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does not the motion to print open the merits of the report to discussion? I understand that that motion is always debatable.

The SPEAKER. It would be debatable if the motion to postpone were not pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then I understand that it is in order for the gentleman from Michigan to speak at this time upon the motion to print? Both the questions are before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KILGORE. I hope my colleague will withdraw the motion to postpone, and allow the gentleman from Michigan to be heard.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to know if it is the purpose of the majority of the committee to cut off all debate upon this new programme of the Administration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that the motion to postpone and print is still pending, and I would ask if it be in order to move an amendment to that motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to amend by postponing to a different day.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I move to amend by postponing until Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to ask the gentleman to extend the time until Monday three weeks. Then we can have the voice of the country on this question.

["That is right!" "That is right!" from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Then the people can be heard to speak from all quarters. It is of the highest importance that the people should be heard.

Mr. HILL. By the permission of the gentleman from Michigan—

Mr. EDIE. I object.

Mr. HILL. You do not know what you are objecting to. I will move an amendment to the motion to postpone, and I wish to state my reasons for it—reasons which are purely personal to myself. I have been detained here for some days, on account of this measure, very much to the injury of my private interests. The time has come when I can stay no longer; and if the health of my family will permit, I must leave here for my home. I am compelled to do it. I must return as soon as I can. I do not know that I can pair off, or who to propose to pair off with. I have not studied this measure, having only heard it read from the Clerk's desk; and I want time to reflect on it. Perhaps by taking it with me, and staying in the State of Georgia during the coming week, I may return here better prepared than I am now to decide upon it. I may bring some light from that quarter on it. [Laughter.] I ask for this time; and in order that the measure may not come up in the mean time, as I desire to vote upon it, I move that the bill be postponed until Thursday of the week after next. I make the motion without consultation with any one, and purely for the reasons given.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, (to Mr. HOWARD.) Accept that.

Mr. HOWARD. I accept that as a modification of my amendment, and I will accept of none other.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to say on this motion, one or two words only—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I thought that the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not through. I yielded the floor for the purpose of having a question asked, as I supposed; and when I found that debate was following, I objected. I will yield no further, nor to any other modification, because I do not wish to be interrupted. I am in favor of the motion, as I have submitted it, to postpone until Thursday week at one o'clock; and for the reason that this is a new bill. Not a member, I believe, on this side of the House, has had an opportunity to read it. They have only heard it read from the Clerk's desk a few moments ago. It is a new bill, and unlike either the Senate, or the House, or any other bill ever proposed in either House of Congress since the organization of the Government. Whether it is to be accepted or rejected—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the discussion of the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The attention of the Chair was inadvertently withdrawn for the moment. The Chair will try to keep the gentleman within order according to the Chair's understanding of the rules.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, whether this bill shall be finally accepted or rejected, it is at least worthy of the most serious consideration of every member of the House. I do not think that there is any necessity for throwing it open to debate, but I think that there should be ample time for each member to read it after it has been printed, and to examine it. When that has been done, then let us come to a vote and end it. I think that the time proposed gives ample time for an examination of the bill, and I accept the proposition. I conceive that it will be found, from an examination of the bill, that it involves something altogether unusual in the legislation of this country. It proposes one set of conditions if a Territory apply for admission with one constitution, and another set of conditions if it apply with any other constitution it is possible to frame hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Michigan is wandering a little from the legitimate line of debate.

Mr. HOWARD. I will wander back again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not suppose that it is the wish of the gentleman from Michigan to speak out of order.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to keep in order; but I wish to urge the reasons why this bill should be postponed and printed. Sir, I think that every member should have an opportunity to make up his mind, whether or not, if the population of Kansas be sufficient for her admission under the Lecompton constitution, the same population is not sufficient for her admission under any other constitution. Why should we not make up our minds whether one set of conditions are to be imposed if she apply to come in as a slave State, and another set of conditions if she apply as a free State?

Mr. HUGHES. I call the gentleman to order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The shortest way to determine this question of order will be, the Chair thinks, to submit it to the gentleman from Michigan himself, whether or not he considers that he is discussing the merits of the proposition?

Mr. HOWARD. I must discuss the importance of printing the bill. I wish to keep in order.

The SPEAKER. The question is to postpone.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The motion to postpone is the only one that can be voted on, and that is the only one now debatable. The motion to print does not come up until after the motion is disposed of.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would ask the Chair whether the motion to lay upon the table and print, and to postpone and print, have not been debatable before a division was called for?

The SPEAKER. The proposition usually has been to lay upon the table and print. A division of the motion to print and postpone could be called for; or, if the motion be as it now is, to postpone and print, a division can also be called for. In that case, the first question for the House to decide would be the motion to postpone. That is the question now pending: "Will the House agree to the postponement which has been moved?" and the gentleman must confine his remarks to the merits of that proposition.

Mr. GROW. I desire to inquire if the motion to print would come up as a separate question after the question to postpone is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have but little parliamentary experience. I have never yet knowingly violated a parliamentary rule, and I will not now; but I am constrained to urge, with as much force as I may, the reasons why the consideration of this matter should be postponed, and the report printed. We have labored faithfully in the committee to hit upon a proposition upon which we could all agree. For the last two or three days efforts have been made which lead me to suppose that a portion of the members of this House have seen and examined this bill, while another portion of the House have had no such opportunity.

Mr. HUGHES. I insist upon my question of order.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. HUGHES. I call the gentleman from Michigan to order.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The House will preserve order. The Chair will try to give each member on the floor his rights. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to rise in his place and call any gentleman to order, and he has a right to have his call to order respectfully and properly considered by the Chair. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Michigan was in order in the remarks he was then making, and therefore overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not be interrupting the gentleman from Michigan with these questions of order.

Mr. HOWARD. If I am correct in that impression—and I think I am—the Administration side of the House has been in labor on this subject. I think they have had an opportunity of examining this proposition; while we have had no such chance. Perhaps I am the only man upon this side of the House who has seen it. May I not, then, appeal to gentlemen upon both sides of this House, standing here as we do willing to take this vote without any motion for delay, without any filibustering or any debate—may I not, I say, appeal to their sense of fairness to print this proposition and lay it on our tables, that we may examine it at our leisure, and meet our responsibilities to our constituents like men?

As I have already said, I have no partiality for Thursday as the day on which the vote shall be taken. Possibly, it could be done on Monday. But I will leave the motion standing (as I accepted the amendment) without alteration.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether, at any time, it will be my right to discuss the merits of this proposition before the vote is taken? Will I have that opportunity as a matter of right, or is it to be a matter of courtesy? I am not permitted now to go into the merits of the question; but I ask whether, under the parliamentary rule, it is my right to speak on the merits of the bill at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is the gentleman's right to speak at any time if he gets the floor, and the pending proposition is a debatable one.

Mr. HOWARD. That would be my right as a member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right as a member of the committee, which any other member does not possess, except as a matter of courtesy. Usually the floor is assigned, under the practice of the House, as the Chair understands it, in controverted matters, first to the members of the committee who have had charge of the subject, and then to other members upon the floor of the House. That is the usual courtesy observed by the Chair, but it is not a matter of right.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish so to arrange this matter that the understanding of my colleagues may be completely carried out. When I arose for the purpose of moving this postponement, I undertook to say that, at some time, I desired to speak to the merits of the matter five or ten minutes. My remark was misapprehended. Objection was made; and finally my colleague on the committee made the original motion to postpone until to-morrow. If I could have this right or courtesy extended to me, I would avail myself of it hereafter. I do not propose to proceed now, as, perhaps, it would be disagreeable to the House. If I may have that right or courtesy extended to me at some other time to speak to the merits of the bill, I will not trespass upon the time of the House, whenever I do it, to exceed ten minutes.

[Cries of "Go on now!"]

Mr. HOWARD. Shall I speak now by the unanimous consent of the House, or shall I speak at some other time?

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust the gentleman will be allowed to go on now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I waive all objection to the gentleman's speech.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have not the slightest objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the House to be allowed ten minutes to discuss the merits of the pending proposition.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I hope the time will not be limited, and that the gentleman will have an hour if he desires it.

Mr. CLEMENS. Nobody objects.

The SPEAKER. It is suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, that the limit of ten minutes be withdrawn, and that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to say a word upon that matter. I have no objection at all to the proposition, if an opportunity to reply to whatever remarks the gentleman may make be given; but I think that the bill had better be printed, so that all of us may see it before any comment is made upon it. I think that is the fairest way; and the gentleman (so far as I am concerned) shall have an opportunity to speak at the right time.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, then, I consent to that, and I hope the vote will be taken.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I wish to say a word upon the question of postponement. I think this House will bear me witness that from the beginning of the session I have acted upon this question fairly.

Several MEMBERS, (on the Republican side of the House.) Yes! yes!

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to say to my colleague that I did not yield the floor, but I will, in order that he may proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from Michigan had yielded the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I am perfectly willing to ask this courtesy at some other time, and to let the vote be taken now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to speak upon the pending question to postpone, and not upon the merits of the principal question. I was remarking that the House will bear me witness that I have acted upon this Kansas question with entire fairness. I have asked no vote without due notice, and I wish to pursue that course to the end. My judgment was, that a postponement until to-morrow would afford ample time for every gentleman upon the floor to form his opinion on the merits of this bill.

In reply to what my colleague upon the committee said—that this question has just been sprung upon the House, and that no one had had an opportunity to see the bill—why, sir, another bill, the proposition proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY], the one which this House passed, was sprung upon the House instantaneously, and no one upon this side of the House had seen or read it. And yet we did not complain.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to state, that not one thing has occurred between me and either of my colleagues on the committee that I have the least reason in the world to complain of. The understanding with them was perfect, that I should have an opportunity to move to postpone.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly: and my colleague recollects very well that I stated that the report had better be printed before making any comments. Now, then, I think this day week is too long a time to postpone it to. I think to-morrow is long enough; but I am willing that this proposition may be read and studied by every gentleman that has to vote upon it, and that it be postponed until Monday, at one o'clock.

Mr. ENGLISH. I withdraw my motion, and accept that of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. HILL. I move to amend that proposition so as to postpone until the second Monday in May.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust that motion will be voted down.

Mr. HILL. I make the motion to accommodate others as well as myself, who will be necessarily absent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This question has been discussed for months upon the message of the President of the United States. Various propositions have been made; and now, at this culminating period of the contest, a new programme has been presented from the other side of the House, which we have not had an opportunity of reading or examining. I think that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL], to postpone till the second Monday in May, is a very judicious one; and, without going into an argument about the matter, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The effect of sustaining the previous question would be to cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I withdraw the previous question, and hope the vote will be taken.

The SPEAKER stated that the first question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] to postpone the further consideration of the subject until the second Monday in May.

Mr. DEAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, and nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Collins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandigo, Savage, Scates, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcofer—105.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. BOCKOCK stated that Mr. GARNETT had paired off with Mr. HICKMAN upon all questions relating to Kansas.

Mr. GILLIS stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. STEWART, or he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, stated that he had paired off with Mr. HORTON until the 30th instant. He should otherwise have voted in the negative.

Mr. HOWARD stated that he had been requested to say that Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, had paired off with Mr. GILLIS.

Mr. PURVIANCE stated that Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, had paired off with Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that if he had not paired off he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. LETCHER stated that Mr. POWELL had been called home on business, and had paired off with Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois.

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that Mr. LAMAR was still confined to his room by indisposition, and had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Illinois.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, stated that he had voted in the negative because he was as ready to vote upon this proposition now as he should be at the time to which it was proposed to postpone the subject; but that he would change his vote and vote "ay," to meet the wishes of those in whose views in relation to this question he sympathized.

Mr. LAWRENCE changed his vote for the same reason.

The result of the vote having been announced, as above recorded, the question recurred on agreeing to the proposition to postpone as amended.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. HILL's amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (at fifteen minutes after two o'clock, p. m.,) moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 100, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burris, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stensong, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer, 100.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Bryan, Bullington, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Connors, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Dammrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Good, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Lench, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Unton, Wade, Waide, Waldron, Walton, William B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—112.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to call the previous question on the pending proposition?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order when the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] is disposed of. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The House has already postponed the consideration of the main question to a certain day.

The SPEAKER. The question will recur upon agreeing to the proposition as amended.

Mr. HUGHES. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion until the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether the Chair decides that the motion to postpone until the second Monday in May having been adopted by the House, the question must still be subject to another vote?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] was moved and received by the Chair as an amendment to the original motion to postpone.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I supposed that they were distinct propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced that it was an amendment, and the Chair so received it. The question will recur upon the proposition as amended; but the pending motion of the gentleman from Illinois must first be disposed of.

Mr. TRIPPE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. I will renew it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will do so.

Mr. TRIPPE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to assign, in a few words, the reasons that induced me to give the vote that I did, and which will cause me to adhere to that vote, unless more light shall be shed upon the subject. I should have preferred some earlier day than the second Monday in May, which is the 10th, although I do think that tomorrow at one o'clock would have been too early an hour to decide this great question, with the new phase it is now made to present. I should have preferred, for instance, next Monday. But, sir, a friend from my own State, whose vote I desire shall be given upon this question, announced that he would necessarily have to be absent. He first moved to postpone the subject until Thursday week; and I should have preferred that day to the one voted on; but I understand that other gentlemen from my own section, personal but not political friends, who desire to vote upon this question, will be absent on that day; and hence, I feel it to be my duty to vote for the postponement until the second Monday in May, and I shall be compelled to adhere to that vote, unless further facts are developed to justify the selection of another day. These are the particular reasons which influenced me in fixing on this day. I can see no controlling reason for not postponing the consideration of this report until that day. I cannot see why any damage should result from the postponement, unless members are afraid of themselves. If gentlemen are satisfied with their own judgments, and will follow the dictates of their own consciences, then no damage can ensue either to them, the measure, or to the country.

I have no idea that there will be any prolonged debate upon the question in this House. If there will be a majority in favor of the new bill it will be in their power to call the previous question upon it whenever it comes up. There may be two or three days' debate, but it need not stand one moment longer in the way of the other business of the House by fixing the 10th of May, than if you were to select any other day. One, two, or three days' discussion from the 10th of May will not arrest business more than the same number of days at any other time. It will be precisely the same thing. I do not intend that my vote upon this postponement shall be taken as an indication of what my vote will be upon the bill itself. There are some features of the bill which did not strike my mind very favorably as I heard it read, and yet due consideration might either remove them, or so weaken them as not to be fatal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot go into the merits of the bill.

Mr. TRIPPE. I am not going to touch the merits. I say that there are some features, which, upon the reading did not strike me as altogether free from objection. I would like to have had an opportunity to examine the bill. I have sought pretty earnestly for the last twenty-four hours to ascertain what the provisions of the bill would be, but I was not able, nor do I now by any means fully understand some of them. But upon its face, as now imperfectly informed, it strikes my mind that there is something in it that read like taking the back track, upon the great question of going back to Kansas and taking a new vote. It certainly does, if I am not greatly mistaken, in its practical operation, make the whole question of admission depend upon another decision by the people of Kansas.

I repeat that I am opposed to a prolonged discussion upon this report, nor do I suppose any one desires it. The House will not permit it, and the country will not permit it. If it is postponed until the 10th of May, the Senate will have acted upon it by that time. If it is adopted then by the House, it will be of as much value as if adopted now, and no harm can possibly ensue. There is a new phase presented in this bill of the whole question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. TRIPPE. I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill, for I do not know enough about it to discuss it. I desire to make this further remark: it was remarked by some gentleman, I do not know now who, that he gave his vote on this question from sympathy with those who agreed with him. Well, sir, I gave my vote out of sympathy with nobody, with no party, but upon my own individual responsibility, and for the reasons stated. I know the custom which has grown up here, of judging of the opinions of men upon the merits of a proposition by every vote they may give upon every collateral question. I beg here to enter my protest against being judged, as to what my position is or may be upon the merits of this or any question, by my vote upon any and every collateral question that may arise—such as this of fixing a time to decide it. And more especially do I thus protest when a measure of this magnitude is thus suddenly presented.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The honorable gentleman from Georgia misunderstands me if he referred to me. I stated that I voted upon the question of postponement to meet the views of those with whom I sympathized upon the main question, and I changed my vote lest I might be understood by somebody as having changed in my position upon this question.

Mr. TRIPPE. I did not intend to make a point upon the gentleman from New York, because I recognize the right of every man to assign his reasons for the votes he may give; but I was entering my objection against the vote of a gentleman upon every collateral question being made a standard whereby he is to be located as to his final action upon the measure. I have seen, from time to time, a sort of compulsory process of this kind thrown around members upon motions to adjourn, to postpone, &c. They have been threatened with being tabooed, with being called to account hereafter, and with the thunders of party. I simply desired, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, to enter my protest against such surveillance and such exactions; and now, in pursuance of my promise, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw that motion. I will renew it.

Mr. TRIPPE. The gentleman from Kentucky understands my position towards the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.] If he consents, I have no objection to withdrawing it.

Mr. BURNETT. I then appeal to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Kentucky promises to renew it, I have no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. I will renew it. I was struck, Mr. Speaker, with the remarks which were made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE,] and I want to see whether I understand his position. He says he would prefer, individually, that the vote should be taken on Monday next.

Mr. TRIPPE. I said I should prefer an earlier day than that proposed by my colleague, [Mr. HILL,] but that I was willing to postpone it until that day, for the reasons assigned.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman says that he does not vote upon the merits of the question on the motion to postpone, and refers to the fact that the opinions of his constituents are held in terrorem over him—that gentlemen are to be tabooed, and all that sort of thing. If anything of that kind has been done, I know not from what source it has emanated. I take it for granted that every gentleman here votes upon his own individual judgment, and upon his convictions of public duty, without reference to what the opinions of others may be upon any subject.

Mr. TRIPPE. The gentleman will allow me to correct him, for certainly he is laboring under a mistake. The remark to which the gentleman alludes was in connection with entering my protest against a practice which I said prevailed. I may have used the word "threatened"—I will withdraw it. I said that men who were the friends of a measure were classed with its enemies if they were not found voting in a particular manner upon collateral questions of adjournment, postponement, &c. I did not refer to the fact that any gentleman was acting under a pressure of that kind, but to the fact that that construction would be given to his action.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say that he voted for postponing until the second Monday in May, because there were certain gentlemen who could not be here to vote if the question was taken at an earlier day. Yet, sir, he denounced those who desired to vote upon this measure on the day which the gentleman said he would himself prefer, that is Monday next.

Mr. TRIPPE. The gentleman certainly misunderstands me. I certainly did not denounce or condemn any gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS. I submit that this discussion is irrelevant to the motion before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is. Mr. CURTIS. Then I object to its going any further.

Mr. BURNETT. The remarks of the gentleman from Georgia were held to be in order when he gave his reasons for the postponement, and I think now that I am not out of order in commenting on them.

The SPEAKER. Whenever the question has been raised the Chair has decided that remarks outside the merits of the motion to postpone were not in order.

Mr. BURNETT. I will endeavor to keep within the rules of the House.

The reason stated by the gentleman from Georgia for his vote to postpone, was in order that there might be discussion of the bill. But the gentleman well understands that under parliamentary law and the rules of this House, if this be postponed, and if the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a special order, there will be no chance to discuss this question. And when this question comes up on the day fixed for final action, I ask him whether he is still willing to leave this question open for discussion? Will he agree to that when we know that it has been discussed here, to the exclusion almost of every other question, for more than four months? One hundred and twenty speeches have been made on the subject already. It has occupied the attention of this House and the country to the exclusion of every other question.

Mr. CURTIS. I demand that my question of order shall be decided, and the decision enforced. This discussion ought not to go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to assign reasons, which he is now doing, why the motion to postpone, which has been carried, should be reconsidered.

Mr. TRIPPE. The gentleman from Kentucky has stated that I said that I desired to have a discussion of this question. I said that I thought two or three days might be devoted to a consideration of this new bill, and devoted, probably, with profit to the House and the country. The gentleman remarked, too, that this matter had been under discussion for a long time. I will ask him whether, until the last two or three days, he, or any member, ever heard of the proposition to submit this land question to the people of Kansas?

Mr. BURNETT. The whole subject of Kansas, in every phase in which it could be presented to the consideration of the House, has been discussed ever since the commencement of this Congress. Now, gentlemen may vote from such motive—the want of time for examination and discussion of the question—while the great body of those who are voting for this postponement, vote with the express purpose of defeating any settlement of this question, and leaving it open.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must call the gentleman to order, as he is now wandering from the merits of the question of postponement.

Mr. BURNETT. I voted to postpone this question until Monday. We are here, the Representatives of intelligent constituencies; and I appeal to gentlemen from the North, as well as from the South, whether they are not prepared to make up an intelligent judgment on this question by Monday next at one o'clock? Do gentlemen desire to feel the public pulse at home? Is it that they want this postponement until they hear how their constituents are? If so, then we had better postpone it until we can all again go before the people, and return here with new certificates at their hands. But, if we intend to get rid of this question; if we intend to restore peace and quiet not only to Kansas, but to the entire Union, then, sir—

Mr. GILMAN. Is the gentleman discussing the question before the House?

Mr. BURNETT. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is observing the gentleman very closely, and will call him to order when he leaves the proper line of debate. Occasionally it is difficult for the Chair to determine whether the gentleman is exactly in or out of order. The Chair will consider the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine as a standing one.

Mr. BURNETT. This bill, I understand, is in the process of being printed. The gentleman from Indiana announced that it would be printed and laid upon the desks of members before the adjournment. We will have it before us to-night for examination; and I appeal to gentlemen whether, upon this simple proposition of a submission of an ordinance, we will not be ready to make up our minds by Monday? Three days are given us from now to examine and consider the proposition. There is not a member who would not be as much prepared on Monday, if he will read and investigate the question, as he would be in twelve months from this time. This is all I have to say. It is a fair proposition for all men who desire to act fairly on the question, and see this Kansas question disposed of. In compliance with my promise to the gentleman from Illinois, I renew the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say a word in justification of myself. Had it not been for the particular reasons I have stated, and which are personal to myself, I would not have suggested the postponement that I did.

Mr. GARTRELL. I dislike very much to interrupt my colleague, or to deprive either of my colleagues of explaining thus early to their constituents their votes on this bill; but I will ask the Chair what is the motion pending, and to state whether that motion is debatable?

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is, that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. GARTRELL. If it is in order for my colleagues to assign reasons for having voted as they have done, then I will ask the privilege to assign my reasons why neither of my colleagues [Messrs. TRIPPE and HILL] are justifiable in their votes.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; and debate is not in order.

Mr. HILL. I beg the indulgence of the House to say one word.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; and debate is not in order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHILLIPS (at three o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 103, nays 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Bryan, Bullington, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Rutledge, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—108.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the above call,

Mr. MORSE, of Maine, stated that his colleague, Mr. Wood, had paired off with Mr. TAYLOR, of New York.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now appeal to the House before this vote is taken—

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. (at three o'clock and twenty minutes.) I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery,

Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bullington, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Dammell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Rutledge, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—98.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HUGHES stated that he had paired off with Mr. BURNETT; that otherwise he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. LANDY had been called home in consequence of sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. RICARD.

Mr. ADRAIN stated that, as the usual time for adjourning had nearly arrived, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, stated that he had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, had paired off with Mr. WOOD.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, said: There is no use of remaining here longer this evening, and I vote "ay."

The House accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 24, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. S. D. FINCKEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented fifty-four petitions signed by five thousand four hundred and fifty-three citizens of California, and a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the enactment of a law to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of steamers navigating the ocean, and propelled in whole, or in part, by steam; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BIGLER presented four petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for carrying the mails between that city and Southampton, in England, in the Collins line of steamers; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of R. T. Walton, and others, heirs-at-law of Jehu Walton, praying that the assignment of a land warrant issued in the name of said Jehu Walton may be legalized; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YULEE presented a presentment of the grand jury of the United States for the northern district of Florida, relative to increasing the pay of the judge, jurors, witnesses, and officers of that court, the irregularities of the mails in Florida, and the propriety of a change in the mails between that State and Savannah, Georgia; the granting of lots in St. Augustine for school purposes, and the session to the State of the United States barracks in St. Augustine for a seminary of learning; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of members of the bar of the northern district of Florida, praying that the salary of the judge of that district may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the memorial of Edward D. Tippet, praying the aid of Congress to test his cold water steam engine; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for an appropriation for carrying the mails between that city and Southampton, in England; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of Thomas Watts, an invalid pensioner, praying to be allowed back pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWARD. I present the petition of James C. Jewett, ship-master and merchant of the city of New York, in which he states that a claim of Mr. A. G. Benson has been heretofore submitted to the Senate for damages, which were sustained by Mr. Benson, in consequence of the action of the State Department in regard to the trade in guano with Peru, and that the Committee on Claims of the Senate have reported in favor of Mr. Benson's claim. Mr. Jewett states that he is the owner of half that claim, and files his petition, praying that the amount due him, $56,000, according to his statement, may be paid to him. I move to refer it to the Committee on Claims. The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to present to the Senate the petition of Mr. William R. Babcock, as guardian for Samuel Pearce, a passed midshipman in the Navy. Mr. Pearce has been for many years insane. He was an officer of the Navy, and by the late naval board he was placed on the retired list, and his pay reduced to that of furlough. The naval court of inquiry restored his pay to leave pay, which is $600. The President approved it, the Senate has confirmed it; but in the mean time, between the action of the naval board and the action of the court of inquiry; his pay, according to the sentence of the naval board, was only $300 a year, a sum which the petition shows to be inadequate to his support. For two or three years he was receiving only the reduced pay of $300. This petition is to obtain from Congress an indemnity for that loss. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not that class of cases was not provided for in a general bill? I think we did provide for it in a bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not recollect.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Was there not a clause of that kind in the bill?

Mr. IVERSON. No, sir. The clause in the regular bill merely referred to officers restored to the active list, and not to those raised to a higher grade. While I am up, before this subject passes away from the consideration of the Senate, I desire to say that it has been my intention for some time to offer a resolution instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency, and, if they find it expedient, to report a bill, or a clause to be inserted in the naval appropriation bill, making precisely this provision for all these officers. I trust, however, that the Naval Committee will take it up without a formal resolution, and act upon it.

Mr. MALLORY. Before this subject passes away from the consideration of the Senate, in response to my friend from Georgia I would say that there are several memorials of this character now before the Naval Committee, and they have the subject under consideration at this time.

Mr. IVERSON. This had better go to the Naval Committee, I will suggest to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Let it take that direction.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. MALLORY. I submit a joint resolution, and in view of its character and the short period of the session remaining, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up, consider, and pass it now. If it gives rise to debate, I shall consent that it lie over until Monday morning, but I presume it will pass in a few moments.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. No. 30) to extend for a further term the provisions of the joint resolution, approved March 10, 1858, in relation to certain dropped and retired officers of the Navy, was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the Senate that I hold in my hand a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, informing the Naval Committee of the Senate that the President of the United States, whose duty it is, under the joint resolution of March 10 last, to take up and examine certain cases which were before the naval courts of inquiry, and which were rejected by these courts, and submit the same to the Senate with his advice thereon, will not have time to give them the examination due to them, between this time and the adjournment of the present session of Congress. The joint resolution heretofore passed, contemplates that he shall examine and submit them, and that the nominations shall be passed upon, and to allow time for this purpose, a postponement is necessary. The committee have recommended that postponement to the 1st of January next. I ask for the passage of the joint resolution now.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SEWARD. Two days ago I introduced a bill, (S. No. 281,) on leave, establishing a line of telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coast. Under a misapprehension, I caused it to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. With the consent of that committee, and also of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I ask the Senate to reconsider that reference, and commit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the Senator that a memorial in regard to telegraphing was referred some days ago to the Committee on the Judiciary. I suggested that it belonged to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] who presented it, insisted upon referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it went there.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know how that may be, but this bill is now in the hands of the Military Committee. The Senator is quite mistaken about the subject-matter. That was a controversy in regard to competition between telegraph lines. This is a bill to establish a line of telegraph.

Mr. BIGLER. I was about to remark that the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely mistaken. The Senator from New York offers a bill which regulates telegraphic operations.

Mr. SEWARD. To establish a telegraphic line.

Mr. BIGLER. It is to establish a telegraphic line. The memorial which I presented was of an entirely different character. It was asking a law to protect certain telegraph companies against what they thought might become an oppressive monopoly.

Mr. SEWARD. The paper which the Senator from New Hampshire has in his mind is a paper which I had caused to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BIGLER. One is a question of telegraph, the other is a question of law entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of steamers navigating the ocean, propelled wholly or in part by steam; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 286) to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts in Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 289) explanatory of an act granting public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad in the States of Florida and Alabama, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COLLAMER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 290) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Mayo, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a joint resolution (S. No. 31) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend the appropriation made July 8, 1856, upon such channel of the St. Mary's river as he may select; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the joint resolution considered now.

Mr. SLIDELL. I object.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Sherlock & Shirley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was recommended the petition of Miles Devine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Miles Devine. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

FINDLEY PATTERSON.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the Court of Claims to return to the Senate the petition and papers in the case of the application of Findley Patterson, for damages as a contractor for the erection of public buildings in the Territory of Kansas.

OUTRAGE ON MR. DICKSON, AT JAFFA.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any correspondence in the Department of State concerning the outrages lately committed against the family of Mr. Dickson, an American citizen residing at Jaffa, in Palestine.

ST. CLAIR FLATS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report the bill heretofore referred to them making an appropriation for the completion of the channel over the St. Clair Flats, in the State of Michigan, and that the appropriation be reduced to $55,000.

Mr. BIGGS objecting, the resolution lies over under the rules.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution which I submitted some days since, in relation to a protectorate over Mexico.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to make a motion to postpone all the prior orders, and take up the deficiency bill. It is very desirable that we should finish it to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe that is not according to the practice of the Senate. While morning business remains, it has precedence; and I move to take up, as morning business, the resolution to which I referred, on the subject of a protectorate over Mexico. I desire to have it disposed of. I wish it adopted, and a committee appointed—if there is to be one—on the subject. That will require no debate. It is a mere matter of reference. I move that the resolution be taken up.

Mr. HUNTER. If it gives rise to no debate, and is merely to be referred, I have no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is all I want.

Mr. WILSON. It will give rise to debate.

Mr. HUNTER. I am told that it will give rise to debate. Then I submit my motion to take up the deficiency bill.

MR. HOUSTON. I move to take up my resolution at all events, whether it leads to debate or not.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Virginia to have been entitled to the floor, but to have yielded it to see whether debate would be had on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

MR. HOUSTON. But my motion being in relation to morning business, his motion could not be made except by courtesy.

MR. HUNTER. No doubt I have the right to make the motion. The Senate can agree to it or not.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 306) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1855, the pending question being on the amendment of MR. FESSENDEN to strike out the following words:

"For the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, consisting of fuel for the officers, enlisted men, guard, hospitals, storehouses and offices; forage in kind for the horses, mules, and oxen of the quartermaster's department at the several posts and stations, and with the armies in the field; for the horses of the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses when serving in the field and at the outposts; for straw for soldiers' bedding, and of stationery, including company and other blank books for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, blank forms for the pay and quartermaster's departments; and for the printing of division and department orders, Army regulations, and reports," $778,000.

"For the purchase of horses for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts," $252,000.

"For the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, consisting of postage on letters and packages received and sent by officers of the Army on public service; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, including the additional compensation and costs of advocates, recorders, members, and witnesses, while on that service, under the act of March 18, 1852; extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of the quartermaster's department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, storehouses, and hospitals; the construction of roads, and other constant labor, for periods of not less than ten days, under the acts of March 3, 1819, and August 4, 1851, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters; expenses of express and of mail from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters, other disbursing officers, and trains, when military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the internment of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the quartermaster's department, including hire of interpreters, spies, and guides, for the Army; compensation of clerk to officers of the quartermaster's department, compensation of forage and wagon masters, authorized by the act of July 5, 1838; for the apprehension of deserters, and the expenses incident to their pursuit; the following expenditures required for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, and such companies of infantry as may be mounted, namely: the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horse and mule shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing, hire of veterinary surgeons, medicines for horses and mules, picket ropes, and shoeing the horses of those corps," $190,000.

"For constructing barracks and other buildings at posts which it may be necessary to occupy during the year; and for repairing, altering, and enlarging buildings at the established posts, including hire of commutation of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops, of storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, and of grounds for summer cantonments; for encampments, and temporary frontier stations," $50,000.

"For transportation of the Army, including the baggage of the troops when moving either by land or water; of clothing, camp and garrison equipment from the depot at Philadelphia to the several posts and Army depots; horse equipments, and of subsistence from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery under contract to such places as the circumstances of the service may require it to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small arms, from the foundries and armories, to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for the purchase and hire of horses, mules, and oxen, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, drays, ships and other sea-going vessels and boats for the transportation of supplies, and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the pay and other disbursing departments; the expense of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; and for procuring water at such posts as from their situation require that it be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads, and removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of the troops on the frontiers," $5,400,000."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1857, $279,377 57.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1857, $129,880 20.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1857, $751,487 15.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for barracks and quarters in the year ending June 30, 1857, $87,954 39.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $300,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department in the year ending June 30, 1858, $50,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for transportation of troops and supplies in the year ending June 30, 1858, $2,000,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for constructing barracks, and other expenses incident to the same, and to quarters for the troops, and to storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, during the year ending June 30, 1858, $30,000.

To supply a deficiency of appropriations for the purchase of horses necessary to be purchased in the year ending June 30, 1858, for the two regiments of dragoons, the two regiments of cavalry, the regiment of mounted riflemen, the companies of light artillery, and such infantry as it may be found necessary to mount at the frontier posts, $100,000.

MR. CHANDLER. I hope this amendment will be adopted, because I believe it proposes to furnish all the Administration needs to carry on the Utah war. The fact is, sir, that I begin to have some hopes of this Administration, for it is evident that they have changed their advisers. On the 27th of January last, when the Army bill was under consideration, I had the honor to submit a proposition, which I perceive has been substantially adopted by President Buchanan and his Cabinet. He has not given me credit for it; he did not consult me privately; but he is evidently acting on my suggestion. I wish to read what I said on the 27th of January last:

"Now, sir, I suggest another remedy. I do not propose to send regiments and bayonets into Utah at this stage of the proceedings; but I propose that we employ a missionary, a sound missionary, a man known to be in the confidence of this Administration. Let him have letters patent from this Administration, showing that he does possess their confidence and represent their views. Send this man alone, without arms and without bayonets, to Brigham Young and to the people of Utah Territory; and after having exhibited his testimonials, let him say to Brigham Young, 'Sir, you are under a misapprehension on this whole question.' He may reply, 'Here is the bill which declares that the people of the Territories shall be left perfectly free,' not only to regulate, but 'to form their domestic institutions in their own way,' and there is no misapprehension about it.' 'Ah! the missionary can reply, 'that was a mere tub thrown to the whale; that was to catch northern votes; that was to save the honorable Senator from Illinois, and the honorable Senator from Michigan, and other honorable Senators, from annihilation at home. It does not apply to the people of the Territories. You must obey the laws; and if you do not obey them we will send an army, and we will exterminate your whole race.' If you can convince him that this man is the faithful exponent of the views of this Administration, and that that army will be forthcoming unless he submit to the laws, you will have no war, for he dare not resist this Government."

Now, sir, Mr. Buchanan has not given me credit for that suggestion, which I made three months ago, though he has substantially followed it. It is true, he has changed the name. I recommended a missionary, and he calls his agent a commissioner. I recommended one; he takes two; but that is immaterial; two certainly will do as well as one, and I accept his amendment. One might be lonesome. As I said, I really begin to have hopes of this Administration, inasmuch as they have changed their advisers; and I trust this amendment will prevail, because these commissioners, I verily believe, will close this whole contest. I think the honorable Senator from Maine has actually proposed a larger appropriation in this amendment than the Administration may require under their present advisement. I have no doubt the President has carried out my suggestion to the letter. I have no doubt these men have gone there with letters patent, and that they will convince Brigham Young that they do represent this Administration; that they are in the confidence of the President; and that Brigham Young will say at once, "I have been under a misapprehension; I have no idea of coming in contact with the Government of the United States." Even this appropriation is twice as large as you will require; but I hope the amendment will prevail.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Brodriek, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doohitie, Durkee, Fessenden, Post, Foster, Hale, Raudin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Sewall, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler,

Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Stidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

MR. HARLAN. I propose to amend the bill by striking out that part commencing with line one hundred and twenty-seven of the first section, and ending with line one hundred and thirty-five. The words to be stricken out are:

"For surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incidental to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, being the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000 for that period," $220,000."

MR. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. HALE. I should like a little further explanation of this item by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN.] I understood him to say yesterday that the knowledge of the appropriation for this service did not reach California until after the contracts were made. I should like to know how long it takes the news to go from here to California, and at what time the appropriation bill was actually passed that year?

MR. GWIN. As I stated yesterday to the Senate, these were continuous contracts. I have a list of them before me. It has been the policy of the Government for many years in surveying public lands to give out certain quantities, and to limit contractors to so much work as would be covered by the appropriation for the current year; but it has never been the practice, until it was established by this Administration, to have the settlements made up to the 30th of June in each year. For instance, when the appropriations for the last fiscal year were exhausted, it has been the practice of the Government, ever since the public land system was established, to keep the accounts continuous; but last year the present Secretary of the Treasury brought the subject before the President, and he decided that the contracts should be settled up to the 30th of June of each year. Heretofore, these contracts running on, if a deputy surveyor could not get through with his contract in a single year, he was paid continuously out of the appropriations as they were made. These contracts were entered into in 1854, 1855, and 1856, and they were always limited to the estimates, and to the amount of work which could be done in the current year. The appropriation bill, in this case, passed, I think, on the 15th or 16th of August, 1856. That was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857. A steamer for California could not have left here before the 20th of that month, and that would make the date of its arrival in San Francisco about the 15th of September, more than three months after the fiscal year had commenced.

The deputy surveyors were then in remote sections of the State, in uninhabited sections, where there was no mail communication. They had to fit out their surveying expeditions at great cost, to protect themselves against the Indians, who frequently committed depredations, killed their men, and robbed their camps. Months must have intervened before they could be aware of the fact that the estimates of the surveyor general had not been passed by Congress, and before he could be aware of the fact that the distances between certain points which they were to survey exceeded the amount of his estimates. This resulted from the fact that there was no reliable information on which to give a statement of the exact extent of the country from one point to another, before the surveys were actually made.

The whole of this deficiency originated without the slightest idea on the part of the contractors or the surveyor general that there would be any deficiency at all, or that there would be any diminution of the appropriation estimated for by him. As I stated before, the cost of the work exceeded the $150,000 estimated for, entirely on account of the distances between the natural objects within which the contracts were given out.

MR. HALE. When were the contracts made?

MR. GWIN. They were made in 1854, 1855, and 1856—so much to be executed in each year, according to the amount of the appropriation estimated for.

MR. HALE. Then, if I understand this case, and I do not know that I do, this appropriation bill providing for surveys in California was passed on the 15th of August, 1856, and the news of it must have got to California as early as the 15th of September, 1856. It would seem to me, then, that it was the obvious duty of the surveyor general, who found out, as early as September, 1856, that Congress had appropriated but $50,000, to do what he could to suspend his work, so as to bring his expenditures within the appropriation made by Congress. It appears, however, that, having the knowledge, certainly as early as the 15th of September, 1856, that Congress had refused to appropriate more than $50,000, instead of making an effort to bring his work within that sum, he goes right on, just exactly as if there had been no limitation, and, instead of spending $50,000, spends $270,000.

Now, I do not know but that he is an honest man; I presume he is. I do not know anything about him. I look at the case outside of anything connected with the character of the man; but, as a great principle of public policy, is it right for Congress to pass over such an act as this, on the part of any officer who, as early as September, is distinctly notified that the Government will not spend more than $50,000 from then until the next July, and still goes on and spends $270,000?

Mr. GWIN. I stated that the surveyor general had no means of communicating with the deputies; and he had no means of knowing what progress they had made with their work. The season there is peculiar; there are eight months without rain. In some seasons the surveyors can make great progress, and in others but small progress. In the first place, the surveyor general could not communicate with the deputies without sending a messenger hundreds and hundreds of miles at his own expense. He had no idea that they could exceed his estimate, and could not tell until he received the returns. It being a favorable season for surveying, they did more than he or they expected. The contractors themselves had not the most remote idea that they were exceeding the appropriation, because it was a subject that never occurred to them. They made the contracts with the surveyor general; the appropriations before that had always been $300,000 a year; he only asked a diminution that year because the previous season had been very unfavorable in those regions; the Indians had been very troublesome; and he had not exhausted the former appropriation; and he expected that $150,000, with the addition of the balance held over from the former year, would cover the service of 1856-57.

I will say to the Senate that every one of these accounts has been adjudicated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The work of every one of these deputy surveyors has been examined, and the surveys have been approved, and the lands are now being offered at public sale. The very work that these officers performed will bring millions of dollars into the Treasury. There are now two and a half million acres advertised, and there are to be millions more in a few days advertised for sale, and ten millions more at the beginning of the next year, making twenty-three million acres altogether, and the whole expense of the surveys has not exceeded a million dollars.

Mr. HALE. I shall not occupy time, but simply say that I think it would be a dangerous principle to sanction this in an appropriation bill for deficiencies. I think there is a great deal of wisdom and a great deal of correct philosophy in the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] that if any of these officers have gone on and in good faith expended money without appropriation, we ought not to wink at it; we ought not to appropriate the money as a matter of course; but in such a case let them come as all other claimants do: with their petition in the nature of a private claim, and let it be investigated. If they have honestly spent the money, we ought to pay them; but do not in the general appropriation bill sanction such a loose practice.

Mr. HOUSTON. In relation to this survey I know very little—nothing except from the remarks I have heard in the Senate; but as to the character of the individual who was surveyor general of California, I can speak with a full knowledge. From fifteen years' intimate acquaintance with him, and with his transactions in public as well as private life, I know there is on the face of the globe no man more honest, more patriotic, and more faithful than he is, and I am satisfied that, though not the most accurate and minute man of business, if he transcended the powers delegated to him, he did so from a full conviction that he was promoting the interest of the public. Sure am I that he had no ulterior views of self-aggrandizement or of pecuniary gain beyond the legitimate salary of his office and the perquisites fairly his. Though it may be somewhat irregular, if it is a claim by an individual for justice, the Government has the same ability to pay it now that it will have at any future time. I cannot perceive the propriety of postponing it and putting in a private bill. If it would be just to pay it as an individual claim, it is equally just to embrace it in this deficiency bill, though I am not much in favor of deficiency bills; but it is as proper to pay it now as at any other time; the consequence of not paying it will be ruin to him. Where a man has been just, honest, and faithful, and where the benefits of his labors and misapprehensions have accrued advantageously to the Government, I do not see any just excuse that we have for postponing it. To receive the work and labor of individuals, faithfully performed, and not require them for it, would be to stamp infamy upon this Government if it is able to pay its debts; and if it is not, let it declare itself bankrupt. If it has the means of paying just demands against it, let it meet them properly, and defray the expenses incident to its existence and preservation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not mean to be understood as refusing ever to pay the debt incurred by the surveyor general of California, but I think we should act consistently in regard to this bill. It is known that the third section of the bill, which makes provision for refunding to the Clerk of the House of Representatives money which he paid out by order of the House, has been stricken out by the Senate, upon the ground that the House of Representatives had no right, under the law, to direct the payment of that money. That, it seems, has been a disputed point, the law having been construed differently by the Departments. It further appears, that the resolution of the House, under which the Clerk made the payments, is a usual resolution, and that payments have heretofore been made under such resolutions without objection. The Senate, however, has decided to strike that section from the bill.

Now, let us not make fish of one and flesh of another. Here is a proposition for paying, not a small sum, as is provided for in the third section, but paying $220,000 in addition to the $50,000 heretofore appropriated for this object. We are asked to pay a debt of $220,000 incurred without any authority of law. But it is said by the Senator from California that the surveyor general of that State was not apprised that Congress would not make a larger appropriation. Does that alter the case? Are the officers of this Government to go on and make contracts upon the presumption that Congress will make appropriations to meet them? By what authority did the surveyor general of California make a contract involving this Government in one dollar's expense? What authority had he to make a contract to involve it in one dollar's expense, unless the law authorized him, or the law appropriated money to it, or he was directed to make the contract? It seems to me that, if we mean to deal fairly with the officers of the Government, we cannot, after striking out the third section, refuse to strike out this clause.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would remark, sir, to the gentleman from Illinois, that upon the very same principle that I voted to retain in the deficiency bill the section proposing to reimburse the Clerk of the House of Representatives, I vote to pay the surveyor general of California. I was opposed to striking out the third section of the bill; I thought it ought to be retained. I thought that if the Clerk had faithfully paid out the money, he ought to be reimbursed, particularly as he had done it under an order of the House of Representatives, because he was their officer, subject to their direction; and if he faithfully executed their orders, the nation, in good faith, was bound to defray the expense, or to repay him the money he had disbursed, and credit him with it at the Treasury. That is the reason I voted against striking out the third section. Now, as the benefits of the mistake of this surveyor general of California have resulted to the advantage of the Government, and it has received the labor performed in consequence of the misapprehension he entertained, I think we are equally bound, in good faith, to pay him.

Mr. PUGH. It appears to me that the distinction between the section that was stricken out, and the section now before the Senate, is so plain that no ordinary amount of ingenuity can confuse them. In the former case, where one of the disbursing officers of Congress had paid out money in violation of law, and we refused to sanction it, it was urged that we ought at all events to reimburse him, because he had been misled by the action of the House, to which the answer was very properly made by my friend from Louisiana that that being an appeal for him personally, the Government having received no consideration for this payment, and not standing in the attitude of confirming the appropriation, but simply of relieving an individual, it was proper for us to entertain it as a private bill.

But, sir, what is this case? The law requires the surveyor general to see that the public lands are surveyed. He has to employ competent persons for that purpose; and whenever he finds surveyors who are competent, he makes a contract with them for a large district of country, approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He has no discretion as to prices; they are fixed by law. It is not a question of favoritism. It is a simple question of quantity. Here is a large tract of country that is to be surveyed at some time. The sole question for the Government, with a view to its revenue, is whether you will survey the whole of it this year, or will take two, three, four, or five years to do it in. That is regulated by the amount of the appropriation. The work is at some time to be done; it is indispensable that it should be done; for until it is done, the public lands cannot be offered for sale.

Now it seems that Congress, having persevered for a number of years in appropriating large amounts for the surveying of districts of country in California, suddenly changed its policy. We know that it has been a source of complaint, and, in my humble judgment, of well-founded complaint, on the part of the people of California, that, owing to the number of private land claims; and to the character of the mineral lands, we have not progressed as we ought to have progressed in securing the settlement of that State. We suddenly stop in an appropriation bill passed in the middle of August, 1856. The fiscal year is entered upon; the surveyors are in the field; they are in a remote part of the State, a part not at all explored. And now what is the fact as it appears by the report of the surveyor general, and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office? That there were errors of distance and of quantities, whereby the amount of work that these men perform exceeded the appropriation for that year. They did it a year too soon, or two years too soon—that is all. The work must at some time be done, and at some time be paid for, and be paid for at the same prices; and to be done either by the same individuals or by others equally competent. We have received the fruits of their labors. They have surveyed this amount of public lands; their surveys are accurate; they have been approved at the General Land Office; the land has been offered for sale; we have received the work and labor of these men at prices which we ourselves fixed; and now we are told that we should not pay for it, either because they did more than we required of them, or because the surveyor general was misled as to the quantities or the numbers of sections. It seems to me to be a proposition that two honest men ought not to dispute about. We have the fruits of their labor, and we are simply asked to pay for it this year, instead of paying for it next year. It seems to me there can be no ground of complaint.

Mr. GWIN. I would say to the Senator from Illinois that it seems a great hardship that the deputy surveyors of California should suffer by his vote on this particular amendment, simply because the Senate struck out the third section of this bill. I voted against striking out that section; but I do not think my constituents should suffer because a majority of the Senate do not do what the Senator thinks is right in that case. We voted together on that section.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from California is in error when he states that it has been the uniform custom of the officers of the Government to give surveying contracts without limit as to amount or time. This is not the uniform custom. It may have been the common practice in California; in fact, I think we have the evidence before us that it was the practice there; but we have no evidence whatever that a similar policy has been adopted and pursued in any other surveyor general's district. And, sir, I know, personally, that this course has not been pursued in the region of country that I have the honor, in part, to represent. I know, at least, that my colleague's successors in office gave no such contracts, nor do I believe that he ever did when he filled that office himself. The contracts are made definite where ever it is possible that they can be thus made. The amount of work to be performed is made specific wherever this is possible. The surveyors general of the district in which I reside have, I know, always attempted to limit themselves, in giving out contracts, to the amount of money appropriated by Congress; and, as to time, have deferred giving out contracts until after the appropriations have been made, in order that they might know what amount of work to contract for.

It seems to me that this is too plain a proposition to require any explanation. That this would be the proper course to be pursued none can doubt; and that it has been the usual course I have not a shadow of doubt. I do not assail the honesty of the surveyor general of California. As to his integrity of character, I have nothing to say. The only point to which I have called the attention of the Senate is, that he has authorized work to be done which Congress never authorized to be done. The only excuse given for this policy on his part by the Senator from California is, that he made contracts that were unlimited as to amount or time. This is doubtless at the foundation of the error; but it makes the error none the less, because that error was committed in writing. It was stated, I believe just now, by the Senator from Ohio, that this had been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. PUGH. I said the surveys had been.

Mr. HARLAN. As to that, the Senator is in error.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from California stated it, and I presume he knows.

Mr. HARLAN. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in the report before me, states simply that these surveys have been certified to be correct by the surveyor general of California.

Mr. GWIN. They have been passed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and only await this appropriation.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask my colleague a question. What will become of the four deputies who have done this work if you refuse here to make the appropriation? Are they to come to Congress and petition from year to year to get the money which is due them for their hard labor? I think this appropriation ought to be made, even though the debt has not been incurred in strict accordance with the law and the custom of the Government. I know, however, that surveyors general heretofore have frequently gone beyond the amount apportioned to them for surveys; and deputy surveyors, from time to time, came to me when I was surveyor general, and since that time have come to Congress, to be paid, if they have not been paid, merely because the surveyor general chose to exceed the amount apportioned to him for surveying. The deputies cannot know whether he has exceeded it or not. Would my colleague have innocent parties suffer—the deputy surveyors of California? If the surveyor general is not competent or honest, remove him from office; but do not punish the innocent deputies. I think the section ought to be retained.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask my colleague if he intends to say that the deputies who have done such work hitherto have come to Congress for their pay?

Mr. JONES. They have had to do so, certainly.

Mr. HARLAN. Then it will be no greater hardship for the deputies in California to come to Congress in person to receive their pay than for the deputies in Iowa to come to Congress for their pay. This is what we propose to allow them to do—to come to Congress, and let the Congress of the United States say whether they shall be paid or not, after having examined the equity of their claims.

I would say further, that I propose to place them just where the majority of the Senate propose to place the Clerk of the House of Representatives. It is stated here that money was paid by him without authority of law; and we are told by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] that he may have an equitable private claim on Congress for indemnity, if he has paid out money under a mistake, and in view of his duty, under a resolution of the House of Representatives, illegally passed. The Senator says he ought to come to Congress as a private claimant; that his claim should be referred to a committee, and that the committee should be authorized to send for persons and papers, and put witnesses on oath, and subject them to cross-examination. If that is to be done in relation to an officer of the House of Representatives, paying, by an order of the House, money out of the contingent fund of that House, it certainly cannot be regarded as a hardship to require the surveyor general of California to present his case in a similar way, when he himself confesses that the work has been contracted for without authority of law.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to make one suggestion to him. This money is not to be paid to the surveyor general at all. It is not proposed to pay it to him, but to the sub-contractors, whose work has been examined by the General Land Office, and approved.

Mr. HARLAN. I have just remarked that this work has not been examined by the General Land Office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office says it has been certified to by this same surveyor general, who, without authority of law, authorized the work to be done; and now I propose to show the Senator from California that these men have been paid for that work.

Mr. GWIN. If you do, I will give it up.

Mr. HARLAN. Well, sir, I read from the message and documents of 1856-57, part I., page 383, the annual report of the surgeon general of California.

Mr. GWIN. What is the date?

Mr. HARLAN. The report is dated September 30, 1856.

Mr. BENJAMIN. A year too soon.

Mr. HARLAN. No, sir. I will take the fact stated in this report, in connection with the report for the year ending June 30, 1857. The surveyor general states, in his report dated September 30, 1856, that but little work has been done, for a reason which he assigns, as follows:

"A few fractional townships have been surveyed where the immediate wants of the settlers enabled them to pay the deputy a sufficient amount beyond the price allowed by the Government, to save him from losses."

It seems that these deputies have not only contracted to do work for the Government at the prices fixed in the law, as I am told by the Senator from California, but that they have been authorized by the surveyor general there, or have without such authority, also charged the settlers on the public lands an additional amount of money which, in their judgment, would justify them for doing the work.

Mr. GWIN. Will the Senator permit me to correct him? This has reference to private land claims—Mexican claims that were adjudicated by the board of land commissioners, where the amount allowed by the United States for the surveys, which was fifteen dollars a mile, would not compensate any deputy surveyor for the work. It has no reference to settlers on the public lands. It has been proposed to change the law so as to give a sufficient amount to enable the surveyor general to make contracts exceeding the present price fixed by law, in order to put a stop to that practice which is dangerous, in my judgment, and never ought to be permitted. The private land claimants, under grants made by Mexico, ought not to be permitted to give the deputy surveyors a compensation over and above what the law authorizes the surveyor general to give them, to induce them to survey their land. The price fixed by Congress is at such a low rate that it is impossible to get the claims surveyed, and it is now proposed to have additional legislation on that subject, so as to prevent that very practice.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from California is again in error. I will read more from this report, in order that he may understand it fully:

"The surveying operations of the State have therefore been confined for the most part to sections where these claims do not interfere, and to valleys in the mountain districts, now so eagerly sought after by the settlers, in the northern portion of the State, adjacent to mining districts and towns; and in the southeastern portion, to the valleys and slopes desirable for stock ranches and agricultural purposes generally."

"Connected with the Humboldt meridian, but little has been done. The rugged nature of the country, and the density of the timber in the most desirable districts, renders it impossible to procure the surveys at the present prices allowed by law. A line has been extended direct and by offsets, along and near the coast north of Humboldt bay, to a point near the State line."

"A few fractional townships have been surveyed where the immediate wants of the settlers enabled them to pay the deputy a sufficient amount beyond the price allowed by the Government, to save him from losses."

But, sir, it makes no difference whether these were private claims or public lands. The surveyors are paid under the laws passed by Congress by the General Government, so that it does not matter whether these were private lands surveyed by the public surveyors at the expense of the General Government, or whether they were public lands not covered with private claims. Here it is clearly stated by the surveyor general in his report that the deputy surveyors have, by the authority, as I think it may clearly be inferred, of the surveyor general, charged the settlers an additional amount to that authorized under the laws of Congress. Wherever they were willing to pay this additional amount, the lands have been surveyed. Where they were not able, or were not willing, they have not been surveyed; and hence he accounts for the limited quantity of public lands surveyed in his district. Now, in order that we may know something of the amount thus charged additional to the sum allowed under the laws of Congress, I propose to read from the report of the surveyor general contained in the message and documents of 1857-58.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from Iowa, that I have laid my hand on a paper which I had mislaid yesterday, from Mr. Hays, the surveyor general, explaining the whole matter. It states the facts, and perhaps he would like to have it read before he goes on.

Mr. HARLAN. I am willing to have it read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

UNITED STATES SURVEYOR GENERAL'S OFFICE,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, March 19, 1857.

SIR: In obedience to the requirements of your letter of the 2d of January last, I forward you, accompanying this, in a tabular form, marked A, a statement of all the contracts entered into with deputy surveyors by me, with the date of the contracts, names of the deputies, the date of the expiration of the contracts, the extent of the contracts, and the probable liabilities incurred upon entering into the same, and out of what particular appropriation it was intended to liquidate the same. By your letter of the 3d of November, 1855, to which reference is made in your letter of January 2, 1857, it was stated that on the 30th of September, 1855, there was applicable to the surveys in this State, the sum of $375,922 08, and that for the present fiscal year there was an estimate of $50,000, which was subsequently appropriated, making the amount applicable, to July 1, 1857, $425,922 08. With this large amount applicable to the surveys, I did not think that any possible difficulty could arise from making the contracts which have been entered into since the receipt of the letter above referred to, as those contracts anticipated the expenditure of only about $280,000. From the knowledge possessed of the nature of the country, but a very imperfect estimate could be made of the extent of the work which could be made within the limit assigned to any contract. The extent of the arable land being found by actual examination much greater than anticipated, the surveys of which would have eventually to be made, in almost every case the returns of work greatly exceeded the amount originally estimated, in consequence of which, and much to my surprise, work to the amount of full $194,000 has been presented since January 18, 1857, embraced by contracts which were originally made to expire during the years 1854 and 1855, but on which extensions of time had been granted to the deputies. This excess of liabilities over the appropriations is one that it was impossible to foresee at the time of making the contracts, and I can only assure the Department that it is as much regretted by me as it was unexpected. The last contract, it will be seen, was made on the 1st day of January, 1857; no more, of course, will be entered into until advised by the Department. Such deputies in the field as could be recalled without utter ruin to them, have been notified of the wish of the Department and have accordingly returned. The surveying of confirmed land claims is continued, with the explicit understanding that the claimants pay the expenses, and only to be reimbursed from appropriations hereafter to be made for that purpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JOHN C. HAYS.

United States Surveyor General of California.

HON. THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Commissioner of the General Land Office, Washington.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not see that there is any information in this paper pertinent to the point on which I was addressing the Senate, not contained in the official report of the surveyor general, to which I have previously alluded. As I was about to state, the additional amount of money which the deputy surveyors probably charged, over and above that allowed by law, increased their pay for each mile surveyed to I think about twenty-five dollars. I stated yesterday that I thought the amount of money paid for the surveys in California had reached the sum of twenty-five dollars a mile. The Senator from California corrected me, by stating that he thought fifteen dollars was the whole amount allowed under the law; and thus far I stand corrected, as I have no doubt he knows what the provisions of the law are on that subject. But the additional sum has been charged as well to settlers on the public lands as to private claimants, as will appear from the papers transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office by the surveyor general. He proposes to increase the pay for the deputies in the field and for office work, and says:

"As the best and clearest method of presenting my views as to the legislation which is required to meet the necessities of the subject, I have taken the liberty of placing them before the Department in the form of the accompanying bill," marked "B."

From that proposed bill I read:

"That for making the surveys of the confirmed private land claims in California, the surveyor general be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay such sum as he may deem reasonable, according to the circumstances connected with each case, not exceeding at the rate of twenty-five dollars for each mile of the boundary lines of any claim, and also for such lines as may necessarily be run and marked or measured, in order to connect the lines of such claim with those of the adjacent public surveys."

In the next section he proposes to allow a deputy the liberty to take testimony in relation to the boundary lines:

"And as compensation for so doing, the surveyor general shall allow him such a sum as may be deemed reasonable, not exceeding ten dollars per day, for the time necessarily so employed, and not more than fifty dollars in any one case."

This is the proposition made by the surveyor general, as being necessary in order to secure for the deputies the amount of compensation necessary to justify them in performing this work. He goes on to explain:

"The present price allowed for surveying the claims alluded to, is such that it is almost impossible to procure competent deputies to execute the work. Hence the present state of uncertainty as to the lines which are to separate the private claims from the public domain will have to continue, unless the additional sums requisite to compensate the deputies for their time and labor, shall be paid them by the confirmers."

He then discards the propriety of calling on the claimants to pay the surveyors who establish the boundaries to their claims, and adds:

"In many cases the proposed maximum would not be more than a just allowance for the execution of the field work."

The proposed maximum is twenty-five dollars per mile, with the additional sum of ten dollars a day for taking testimony. He says that this maximum amount in many cases would not be more than sufficient to pay for the field work, requiring additional pay for the office work, that is, making out in regular form the plats and field-notes, delineating streams, mountains, lakes, timber, and prairie.

Then in the other report which I have just read, we learn that the same system of deputies charging settlers additional compensation has been authorized or approved by the surveyor general. If they were confined to the maximum which he suggests as a proper compensation to be paid, twenty-five dollars a mile, with the additional sum of ten dollars a day for taking testimony, it would seem, if the law only allows them fifteen dollars a mile now, that they have already received ten dollars a mile for this work in addition.

Now, I undertake to say that ten dollars a mile with the additional sum of ten dollars a day for taking testimony is sufficient to pay for this work. I know there originally was, and still is, a disparity between the price of work in California and in my own State; but a large amount of the field work done in Iowa, as well as the necessary office work to make the surveys complete, has, I think, been done for $3 75 per mile for sectionizing, and six dollars a mile for surveying township and meridian lines. In this case, it appears from the papers, that these men have been paid by the people of California for the work they have done, at the rate, probably, of ten dollars a mile in addition to their regular pay; that is, if they did not in these private charges go beyond the maximum amount proposed by the surveyor general to be allowed hereafter by law.

Then, sir, the appeal of my colleague to the sympathy of Senators to pay the poor deputies is misplaced; and I may as well remark here, that he and I differ in our practical knowledge in this respect. He has been surveyor general; I have acted as deputy. He understands, perhaps, the office work in the surveyor general's office; I know how to run, measure, and mark the lines, and make returns; and, having performed work of this kind, I know what the character of my contracts received from his office were; I know what the limits were on those contracts as to time and amount; and, having seen the contracts of other deputies in the field, I know what the policy has been in relation to the work in that part of the country. I know not what my colleague may have done as surveyor general. I know what his immediate successor has done as surveyor general. I know that he did, in all the cases of which I have had personal knowledge, limit the work specifically as to amount and time, whenever the nature of the work would justify this limitation; and I know also that he limited, or professed at least to limit, the number of contracts, as well as the quantity of contracts given out, to the amount of money appropriated by Congress.

Then, by agreeing to the proposition which I make to strike out this clause, we do not impose any hardship on these deputies, because, according to the showing of their own superior, they have already probably been paid, and amply paid, by the private claimants and the settlers on the public lands that have hitherto been surveyed. I regard this as a swindling operation from the beginning to the end; and the Senate is now called on by a solemn vote to justify it, and pay this enormous amount of money for work which Congress never authorized, and that, too, in the face of the conclusive argument of the Senator from Louisiana. According to his argument, if they are entitled to further pay for this work, their right is merely the right of a private claimant, who has performed work without authority of law, and comes to Congress on the equity of the case. Let these men come in that way, and Congress doubtless will allow the claim, after they shall have been satisfied that these parties have not hitherto been paid, and that the work has been properly done, and done at proper prices.

Now, sir, in connection with this matter I desire to state another section of the history of the surveys in Iowa. It is a very easy matter for a deputy in the field, if winked at by his superior, the surveyor general, to make false returns. A large contract was given out in Iowa at one time to a deputy surveyor, who went to the field, as it is said, took a general survey of the country, it being principally a prairie country, a sufficient personal view to be able to delineate with tolerable accuracy the position of streams and groves, and timber and prairie lands, and then he made out regular plats of his work, without ever running with his compass or measuring a single line. According to the formulas provided by the surveyor general, he made his return to the surveyor general's office; and there the fraud in that case was detected in this way: the apparent extreme accuracy of the work aroused the suspicions of the chief clerk. He thought it would be impossible for the surveyor in the field to make his closings with such accuracy in the performance of his work. His work, as delineated by the pen, was too well done; and a deputy sent to the field discovered that a great fraud had been attempted to be practiced on the Government of the United States.

I have been told here, I know not with how much truth, that this surveyor general, as has been often the case with such officers, is not a practical surveyor; that he is a mere civil officer, perhaps honest, but without that professional knowledge which would enable him to decipher the probable honesty of the work which was reported to have been done by these deputies. Now, with a personal knowledge of what has been attempted to be done hitherto, and probably with success, where the superior is not himself a practical surveyor, I think it probable that a large amount of this work, which has been returned to the surveyor general, and by him to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, has never been performed. It may be said that the surveyor general had authority to send out special deputies to examine the work, but that is mere moonshine. Any man who has executed a surveying contract for the General Government, as difficult work as this purports to have been, knows that no deputy ever did examine that work. He may have gone to each district, and seen that some of the work was done, but he never could have examined so as to know that it was all done, and properly done. He may have seen that some of the lines were run; that some of the corners were established; that some of the monuments were put up, and properly put up; but he never could know, by a personal examination short of that which would almost enable him to perform the work in person, that it had been done.

Why, sir, these surveys are made, in the first place in large sections; that is to say, in scopes of country six miles square. The monuments are a mile apart; and even in a prairie country, in order to find these monuments, a man must have his compass, he must have his chain, and his flag-man, and his chain-man, and he must run the lines in order to find the corners. A man cannot know that this work has been done short of the performance of an immense amount of labor that never can be performed for three per cent. on the amount of the contract. Hence, although there have been special deputies appointed, and properly appointed, I doubt not, we cannot know, from the state of the papers now before Congress, that this work has ever been done; and if it has been done, the probabilities are, from the showings here made by their superiors in office, that they have been paid by the people of California as much as the work is worth; and no injury can result to these men by requiring them to submit their claims to that kind of critical examination proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, in relation to other claimants, who were originally intended by the House of Representatives to be included within this bill.

An attempt has been made to show a marked distinction between this case and that to which I have just alluded, where the Senate, I believe, has refused to allow the claim; but there is none in principle. The claim which the Senate refused to allow was for money paid out, as is stated, without authority of law; and the officer paying out that money comes to Congress and asks them, in a general deficiency bill, to refund the money so paid by him, under a resolution of the House of Representatives. In this case the money has not been paid out, but a surveyor general has agreed to pay it. He has made a contract to pay the money; and without having advanced it himself, proposes that Congress shall make the appropriation necessary to cover it, although Congress originally intended to limit the quantity of this work to be performed to that which could be secured by the payment of $50,000.

Mr. GWIN. I should like the Senator from Iowa to give the authority on which he states that Colonel Hays is a mere civilian, and not a practical surveyor.

Mr. HARLAN. I have heard it stated here. Mr. GWIN. Then the gentleman has heard what is a positive falsehood.

Mr. HARLAN. I stand corrected.

Mr. GWIN. He is a practical surveyor, and was for years engaged in surveying in Texas before he went to California. When a man is absent, and his character is to be assailed, as the late surveyor general of California has been assailed by the Senator—

Mr. HARLAN. I disclaim having assailed the character of Colonel Hays. I said distinctly, in the remarks I have just made, that I knew nothing of his character as a man of integrity, and hence had nothing to say as to it, one way or the other. This is a case where an officer of the Government has agreed to pay out money without law, and comes to Congress and proposes that Congress shall appropriate the necessary sum to meet these contracts.

Mr. GWIN. Colonel Hays is not before Congress; he has not come before Congress in respect to this matter at all. This appropriation in the bill is based on an estimate presented by the Interior Department. The Senator has repeated, again and again, that these claims have not been examined at the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Whether that is stated in the Land Office report or not, we know it is the fact, or they would not have sent the estimate here. If they had not been examined in that office, would they have sent here an estimate asking an appropriation to pay them?

Mr. President, there never was a more unfair statement made to this body than has been made by the Senator from Iowa in regard to this case. He says the citizens of California have paid the deputy surveyors for this work, and he quotes and garbles the public documents to give plausibility to that statement. It is stated by the surveyor general in his report, that in regard to a few fractional townships in Humboldt county, a very heavily timbered country, it being impossible to survey it at the rate of fifteen dollars per mile, allowed by law, without losing a large amount of money, the settlers themselves proposed to give an additional sum to the deputy surveyor if he would survey those townships; and why was that done? There is a law in California, and it pertains to no other State, that the right of preemption attaches to unsurveyed lands. That law was passed in 1853. Every settler on public agricultural lands in California has the right of preemption, and it is a matter of great importance to the settlers in neighborhoods where the lands are valuable, and the timber abundant and likely to be destroyed, that they should have the surveys made as soon as possible. In certain sections in the mountain districts, and in the district of Humboldt, to which the Senator refers, where a few fractional townships were surveyed—a very small portion of the surveys of California, probably amounting to a few thousand dollars—the settlers asked the deputy surveyor to survey the lands, and offered to pay him an additional sum, knowing that he could not do the work for his contract price of fifteen dollars a mile without sustaining a heavy loss. This was for their private convenience, that they might know where their quarter-section lines ran. He had not been instructed by the surveyor general in any way whatever on that point. That was done in 1856, and it does not pertain to this matter.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the Senator if these contracts were not made before 1856?

Mr. GWIN. The quotation the Senator makes is as to surveys that had been paid for by former appropriations, and are not in this deficiency at all.

Mr. HARLAN. I inquire of the Senator if the work here indicated was not done under this contract?

Mr. GWIN. It was paid for though under the appropriations of the previous year. The Senator does not show that it is in part of this deficiency, or that these contracts have not been paid for by former appropriations. He makes a case and says that the people of California have paid for this work. He attempts to sustain his statement by giving an instance of a few fractional townships out of the many millions upon millions of acres of lands that have been surveyed by deputy surveyors, where, as a matter of private convenience, the settlers had paid an additional amount.

I must state in justification of myself, that I have never examined these documents. I did not think the claim would be resisted, and therefore I was not aware of this statement in the surveyor general's report until the Senator read it; but I know the Humboldt country. It is a small section of country, very heavily timbered, where the timber is of great value, and the parties wished to know exactly where their claims were; and it seems from the statement made by the Senator, they gave this additional compensation for that purpose.

But he goes on to say that this is a vast swindling scheme. Sir, that statement is a vile slander—a vile slander upon meritorious men, who have performed service for the Government. Sir, every particle of their work has been examined. Fifteen per cent. on the price of their contracts was retained until the work was examined. The Senator brings up the case of a great fraud attempted to be perpetrated upon the Government in the State of Iowa. Why, sir, it was because such frauds were perpetrated that laws have been passed to protect the Government against them, and the Department retains a portion of the contract price of each one of these contracts. A portion of this deficiency, amounting to nearly forty thousand dollars, consists of the percentage retained until the examining officers, who have gone over all of this work, ascertained to their entire satisfaction that it was properly done. These examining officers are meritorious men, who will compare in character with the Senator himself in every respect. He says the surveys were probably not made. Why, sir, these lands have been surveyed and sectionized, and are now being offered at public sale, and will bring millions of dollars into the Treasury of the United States.

In regard to the private land claims it is well known that some of these claims are for three, four, or five hundred acres, and some for ten to fifty thousand acres; some of them meander along streams, and surveying them is very expensive work. You must have chain-carriers, you must have markers and men to carry the flag, and it is as expensive to fit out a company to survey one of these private land claims as it is to survey a township of land where you run straight lines, and it is utterly impossible that deputy surveyors can survey those private land claims at the price Congress has fixed. Therefore, the claimants, who have been suffering for want of titles to land, and who can get no patents until they are surveyed, and who have been losing thousands and thousands of dollars, the country being left unsettled for want of these surveys and their patents, have agreed to pay out of their own pockets to have their own land surveyed rather than to delay it until a law could be passed, such as has been recommended by the surveyor general, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Senator made a long speech upon a bill that is proposed by the surveyor general, in which it is provided that the deputy surveyors in California shall have twenty-five dollars a mile for surveying private land claims. That measure is not before the Senate. It is to come up in the future. It is the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of the surveyor general of California, and of the Secretary of the Interior, that in order to expedite the survey of private land claims in California, a discretion should be given to the surveyor general to increase the present compensation, and that question will be presented for the consideration of Congress. The Senator from Louisiana knows that on taking my seat here at the last Congress, I offered a bill for this very purpose. A number of these claims have been finally decided by being dismissed from the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is a matter of the greatest possible importance to the people of California to have them speedily surveyed, to separate the private claims from public lands in order that we may know exactly what is public and what is private property, but it is impossible to secure this at the present rates, and it is proposed to legislate on that subject. I brought forward a bill at the last session, but it was not considered. Now the Department comes forward and recommends the passage of such a bill.

Sir, the merits of this whole case, it seems to me, lie in a nutshell. The surveys have been made at legal prices, established by law. There is no fraud that can be truthfully charged upon any of these officers. I know that every one of these deputies has suffered losses, and some of them probably have lost the whole amount of their profits, and even contracts, as their outlays were very great, on account of this delay. As to the surveyor general, Colonel Hays, there is no more honest man, and no one living can impeach him without attaching dishonor to the man who calumniates him. He states, in the letter which has been read at the desk, that he sent an express to the deputies as soon as he had a knowledge of the diminution of the appropriation to notify those who could suspend their work without being ruined to do so. Thus it appears that every precaution was taken, so far as he and his deputies were concerned, to prevent this deficiency.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to ask that we may be allowed to take the question. We have debated this matter a long time. It is time we were closing up the bill if we mean to adjourn in June. Unless we pass the appropriation bills, we cannot do so.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall not detain the Senate five minutes. I merely desire to vindicate myself from the charge of inconsistency which has been iterated and reiterated against those who voted for striking out the third section, and who are going to vote for this appropriation. I do not see any such great inconsistency as gentlemen on the other side seem to think exists. The third section of the bill, which was stricken out by the majority of the Senate with my vote, provides

"That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been or may be made under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress."

If the Clerk of the House of Representatives, acting under a resolution of the House disposing of its contingent fund, had actually made payments in good faith under the injunction of that resolution, and if this section was confined to the reimbursement of money he had actually paid, he would have presented a strong claim, and I do not know but that I should have voted to indemnify the Clerk for any payment he had actually made under the resolution of the House of Representatives. I should have demanded proof of the amount of payment, and of the fact of payment; but this third section went much further than that. It goes not only to indemnify the Clerk for payments actually made, but it authorizes and justifies payments to be made hereafter; payments which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the majority of this body, were illegal and highly improper and injudicious, and which we ought to arrest if we have it in our power to arrest them.

That is the reason which controlled my vote in striking out the third section; but the appropriation in this bill, which is now proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Iowa, in relation to the survey of public lands in California, proposes simply to pay the amount of liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, over and above that authorized by the regular appropriation of $50,000. It proposes to appropriate $320,000, to pay the liabilities which the surveyor general has incurred in the survey of the public lands. It does not propose to pay him anything he has actually paid out; it is not pretended that he has paid out a dollar to the deputy surveyors; but he has made contracts with them in advance of appropriations made by Congress. That is the simple case.

The question is not whether we will indemnify the surveyor general, as in the case of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, but whether we will actually appropriate money to pay for the work which these men have done, and to pay it to the persons who have done the work; because, as to the liability of the surveyor general, that is merely nominal. He cannot pay $320,000. Nobody can suppose for a moment that he has the ability to pay $220,000, to the deputy surveyors and their employes. His liability, therefore, though it legally exists, is merely nominal; and if Congress do not appropriate the money the surveyor general does not lose, but the deputy surveyors and the workmen under them. I think it is right that we should pay them, although the work has been done in advance of appropriation, and that may have been wrong. I do not pretend to justify the surveyor general for having made these contracts in advance of the appropriation; but he justifies or excuses himself, and the fact is, that the work has been done; the Government has got the benefit of the work; and if it had not been done last year it would be at some future time, and would cost the Government quite as much hereafter as heretofore; so that it is the difference betwixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, which, for my life, I cannot see. You might as well pay now as hereafter. The work has been done; the Government has got the benefit of it; and it is a simple question whether we will pay the individuals who have actually done the work under the authority of the surveyor general, or refuse to pay them. I think there is no inconsistency in our action.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire simply to return my thanks to the Senator from Iowa for his compliment to the demonstration which I made, as he says, perfectly conclusive that the third section ought to have been stricken out of the bill; and at the same time to say that I would accept his compliment as more sincere if he had voted in accordance with that demonstration; but, as he voted against it—

Mr. HARLAN. I beg to correct the Senator. The Journal will show that I voted to strike out the section.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Journal shows that the gentleman voted for retaining the section.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 112.

The Secretary proceeded to call the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. HARLAN.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] was necessarily called away from the Senate to-day, and I have agreed with him not to vote. But for that I should have voted for this amendment, and vote against the bill on its final passage.

Mr. YULEE (who at first voted in the negative) said: I desire to withdraw my vote. I voted hastily, not recollecting that I had agreed to pair off with a gentleman who is absent—the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor.]

Leave was granted to withdraw the honorable Senator's vote; and the result was then announced—yeas 13, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Foster, Hale, Harlan, King, Seward, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—34.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. CLARK. I have an amendment to offer as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That if any part of the moneys hereby appropriated shall remain unexpended at the end of the fiscal year terminating June 30, 1859, all such sums as shall so remain unexpended shall be carried to the surplus fund account, and shall not be paid from the Treasury without further specific appropriation.

I offer this amendment to make it uniform with the law upon the rest of the appropriations, and also to avoid an ambiguity that there may be under the Constitution. This bill being for the support of the Army, the question may arise when its provisions are to take effect? and the answer is, immediately; and the balance of these appropriations unexpended would be carried to the surplus fund, by the law, on June 30, 1860. This amendment provides that they shall go to the surplus fund on June 30, 1859, with the rest of the appropriations that were made for the fiscal year 1857-58. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADE. I suppose this bill is to pass; and although I do not wish to enter into any special debate on the subject, it seems to me that I ought not to suffer it to pass without entering my protest against it, and the principles upon which it proceeds. Our relation with the Mormons in Utah is of a peculiar character. It is an anomalous condition of affairs. It is such a state of things as has never arisen in the administration of the Government before, and probably never will again. I regret exceedingly that, after we got into this difficulty with them, the President, before acting in such a manner as to commit the Government to any particular course of proceeding, did not consult Congress on the subject, because if he had consulted us before he proceeded to put the troops in a position of jeopardy, or did anything which might seem to foreclose our free choice as to the course we should adopt, I do not believe such a bill as this would ever have passed this body. There seemed to be no immediate necessity of proceeding on this subject. This little handful of people, the Mormons, some years ago went into this remote wilderness, more than a thousand miles from any settlements of our community. They were there by themselves, and, according to our latest ideas, they were regulating their own institutions in their own way, and however they might regulate them was of very little interest to the rest of the people of the United States, at present at least. The President might well have waited before he proceeded to commit the Government to any course of action, until he consulted Congress on the subject, because there was no immediate necessity for proceeding. No one's interests were to be prejudiced or jeopardized by anything this band of fanatics might undertake to do. The last Administration, I believe, met with the same difficulty, and yet no particular course of proceeding against them was marked out, so as to involve this Government in expense and conflict.

If I admit that the question of the proper policy to be pursued in regard to this people is one of great interest, and, I may say, of great embarrassment, so much the greater the reason why the Executive should first have submitted it to Congress for their advice before he proceeded to commit the Government by his action. I think it would have been much more in harmony with the Constitution of the United States for him to have consulted Congress, than at once, because he was Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to make such a disposition of the Army as should almost of necessity involve us in a war without consulting Congress. I am not about to argue the point whether the course he has taken is constitutional. The arguments of other gentlemen have left very little doubt on my mind that it was unconstitutional; but, at all events, it was inexpedient.

This was a case which did not involve the honor of the people of the United States. The fact that a little band of men, far off in a remote wilderness, failed to receive the officers we sent there to govern them, did not imperatively demand our interposition. It might have been very impudent on their part, and it did furnish this Government with the right, undoubtedly, to take the proper steps to proceed against them; but, sir, a statesman should look to things as they are. Was it best that we should involve ourselves in a war with that little band, in which neither honor, reputation, nor profit could be gained? Your armies marching on such a service could not be imbued with those high principles of chivalry and honor that always characterize an army who are about to meet their equals upon the field, and that tend to elevate and inspire them with noble sentiments of patriotism and courage; but they must feel that they are on a miserable errand; that they are to destroy their fellow-citizens, who are weak, and unable to resist them; and that no honor can be won in such a contest.

Now, sir, what is the end proposed? Has any Senator contemplated the result of what we have entered upon? Can we fully see what the result of all this is to be? One thing is certain—that you are to expend now more than seven million dollars of money in this enterprise. That is appropriated to start with in what is called a deficiency bill; and it may well be asked, if you commence it with a deficiency bill of $7,000,000, where will you end?

I know very well that the enormous power of this great Republic can crush this people; but I know as well that it will cost a great deal of money, a great deal of hardship, a great deal of hazard to your army; and yet I know that no honor can be won in such an effort. You may govern them; but I fear that you have embarked in an enterprise that will embarrass you much more than did the inconsiderate war that you waged with the Florida Indians. You might have bought them off with a fifth part of the money that you expended to force them into submission; and yet, in dealing with such a people, in my judgment, that would have been the most politic course, and equally honorable to the nation.

I know that you must proceed differently with nations, according to their ability to resist. It would not do for us to brook in an equal insult that we might overlook, on grounds of policy, in a power so weak that we know they cannot resist us. We can afford to act upon very different principles in treating with a tribe of fanatics like these Mormons, from those we should pursue towards Great Britain or France. It would be cowardice in us to submit to an insult from them on grounds of policy; but we might well do it with an Indian tribe or a Mormon community.

I have reflected as to what will be the end of all this. Will your $7,000,000 end this war? What we have undertaken is not in harmony with the great fundamental principles of our Government. We have undertaken to govern a portion of the people of these United States by force of arms. I do not know but that they have compelled us to do it; but it is exceedingly to be regretted if it is so. I do not know what will be the end of such a violation of the principle of self-government upon which our institutions are founded. When you have overcome the Mormons, when they have been compelled to surrender to your superior power, what is to be done then? Is there any Senator here that has consulted the history of the world, who does not know that fanaticism was never overcome by force? Is there any gentleman here who can point to any instance in the history of the world where religious fanaticism has been put down by force? No matter how absurd it may be, you cannot put it down by force; and probably the more absurd it is, the greater is the tenacity with which its votaries cling to it. The history of the world has taught a lesson which we should regard. What are we to do with them when we have conquered them? When, at the expense of untold millions, they have surrendered to our army, what then? Is the army to be continued there through all time, to govern that people by force? Who does not know that the very moment the troops are withdrawn, the people there will set up again upon their own hook, and govern themselves according to their own fanatical ideas?

Sir, I fear that this subject has not been well considered. If, after incurring even this great expense, you could overturn any force they can oppose to you, and if, when you had done that, all would be peace, and you could govern that country in accordance with American principles, I would not be so apprehensive of the result; but I fear that you are about to wage a war on this people to which there will be no end; that you will have to govern them by force, and you must hereafter forever keep up an army there to govern them as a province of this Union. How inconsistent with our principles! How apt it will be to taint the whole mass! I do not believe there is any necessity for it.

I wish to Heaven that since the new principle of squatter sovereignty was said to be inaugurated, we had lived up to it. If there ever was a case for its application, it was here. These people went out from among us in order to get as far from us and our influence as they could. Twice they had a settlement in the States, and twice they were driven out, by right or by wrong, I do not know which. I only know that they have no tongue here to tell their tale. I know that we hear awful accounts of them; but these accounts come from men differing from them in religion, differing from them in all their ideas of government, prejudiced against them, no doubt, and justly too, I think; perhaps I am also prejudiced against them; but it is unsafe to proceed upon our prejudices to the last extremity, without further inquiry. Every man should be apprehensive of his own weakness, and not give way to prejudice without going into the sober counsels of experience, and consulting the other side to see, if they have resisted our force, why they did it. I do not know that we have even inquired why it was that the Mormons resisted the right of our Governors to take their seats there. I do not know that any answer could be obtained if an inquiry was made; but I know there is danger always in proceeding upon violent prejudices, and without inquiry.

I wish the President had come to the conclusion that it was best to allow these people—a small body of fanatics, anomalous in all their views of government and morals, and in everything else incompatible and irreconcilable with our habits—to manage their own affairs. I wish he had invoked the great principle of popular sovereignty, and said, "it shall be applied to these people, and they shall govern themselves. They have gone into a wilderness more than a thousand miles removed from any of our settlements, where there is no communication with them, and where it is a matter of indifference to us on what principle they regulate their domestic institutions." I believe it would have been better for us all if the President had said they should regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way; for, after all, their morals, perverted as I know them to be, their religious ideas are their own, and are not to be inquired into by me or anybody else here. It is not proposed that we shall correct their morals in any of the respects of which we complain. If polygamy prevails among them, do you propose to rectify that? No, sir. Are there any heresies in their religion? Certainly you cannot correct them. Then, though we argue about polygamy and the practices of these people, it is not with a view to correct them at all, for that is not and could not be a part of the proposition. It is used in the argument, and it can be used nowhere else.

Since I find fault with and arraign the President of the United States for involving us in this crusade against this knot of fanatics in a remote wilderness, I perhaps ought to suggest what I would have done, because I have admitted that the case is one of some difficulty. I would endeavor to make peace with them on the best terms I could, knowing that a victory over them would be won at great hazard and expense, and would be perfectly barren when it was won. I would consult them as to their alleged grievances; I would ascertain what they were; and thus I would be able to tell Congress of what they complained. I would go a step further, though perhaps nobody here would join me in it—I would repeal their territorial government. Nay, sir, if I had been consulted as a member of Congress, I would never have agreed that they should have a territorial government with the ideas prevailing there. Knowing that they were the advocates of a theocracy; knowing that they held no principle of government common to us, and therefore that it was impossible to govern them upon our principles, I would not have erected a territorial government there; but having committed that error, I would retrace our steps.
